
Senate Joint Resolution 2, memorializing Congress relative to reimbursement by the Government of the United States for moneys paid by the State of Nevada for military purposes

[Approved February 4, 1928]

Whereas the Territory of Nevada was created by act of Congress March 2, 1861; and

Whereas said Territory was repeatedly called upon by the commanding general of the Department of the Pacific during the years 1863 and 1864 to furnish and equip troops to protect from warring Indians the overland mail route; and

Whereas at that time the routes to the Pacific coast by sea had been closed and there were not sufficient troops otherwise available to protect and keep open said overland route; and

Whereas the conditions then existing and the exigency of the occasion is shown by the statements of General Wright, one of the many similar being, "The Indian disturbances * * * threaten the entire suspension of our mail facilities as well as preventing any portion of the vast immigration approaching from the East. * * * It is impossible for us at this moment to purchase horses and equipment. Each man would have to furnish his own"; and

Whereas the Territory of Nevada then comprised a vast, sparsely populated desert region between two great mountain ranges, 1,500 miles distant from railroad communication, and where the then cost of living vastly exceeded that of any other section of the United States; and

Whereas in pursuance of said most urgent calls for troops, repeatedly made, the Territory of Nevada provided a regiment of Cavalry and a battalion of Infantry, by the aid of which troops only the overland mail, stage, and immigration route was kept open to the Pacific coast; and

Whereas in order to at all provide sufficient troops for the purpose the Territory was compelled to, and did by act of its "legislative power," provide for the payment to her troops of certain compensation in addition to that then provided to be paid by the United States to troops in other sections of the country, and to meet such payments the Territory, being without other means, was compelled to and did authorize a bond issue in the sum of $100,000; and

Whereas such additional compensation was intended to cover the expenses of recruits prior to being mustered into the service and to equalize in part the difference in the purchasing power of the soldier's pay due to the increased cost of all necessary supplies in the region; and

Whereas the officials of the Territory may well have assumed that the Territory would be reimbursed under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 27, 1861, entitled "An act to indemnify the States for expenses by them in defense of the United States" (12 Stat. 276), and the letter of Secretary of State, Hon. William H. Seward, of date October 14, 1861, addressed to governors and containing the statement, "There is every reason to believe that Congress would sanction what the State should do and would provide for its reimbursement"; and

Whereas under the act of Congress creating the Territory of Nevada "legislative power was vested in a governor," appointed by the President, "and a legislative assembly," and all legislative acts and executive proceedings were required to be transmitted to the President of the United States and to the Senate and House of Representatives, and were so transmitted, and no objection was made by the President or the Congress to said acts creating said debt for said military purposes; and

Whereas on March 21, 1864, Congress adopted an enabling act authorizing the people of the Territory to frame a constitution and to become admitted into the Union as a State; and

Whereas the impelling motive of the administration and of Congress at that time in adopting such enabling act was to create an additional State in order to provide for ratification of the then contemplated amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery, which proposed amendment was deemed by the administration of President Lincoln, according to the statement of Hon. Charles A. Dana, then Assistant Secretary of War, to possess a moral force "equivalent to new armies in the field—that it would be worth at least a million men"; and

Whereas in pursuance of said enabling act the people of the Territory of Nevada adopted a constitution and submitted the same to President Lincoln for approval, notwithstanding the fact that the people of the Territory had just previously overwhelmingly defeated a similar proposed constitution initiated by Territorial action, and notwithstanding the further fact that the effect of admission to statehood was to shift the expense of local government from the United States to the few people then inhabiting the Territory; and

Whereas upon admission the State was morally bound to assume payment of all debts and obligations contracted by the Territory, which assumption was made by a provision of the State constitution and the same approved in accordance with the provisions of the enabling act by President Lincoln; and

Whereas the State of Nevada was bound to and did continue to carry out the policy inaugurated by the Territory, and did carry out its obligations to pay the debts created by the Territory and others necessarily contracted in continuing such policy, and that in order to do so the State was compelled to and did borrow money upon a bond issue for such purpose, and has since continued to refund said bonds and to pay interest upon the same; and

Whereas by acts of Congress of June 27, 1882 (22 Stat. 111), and October 6, 1886 (24 Stat. 217), the Secretary of the Treasury, with the aid of a board of examiners consisting of Army officers, was required "to examine and investigate" the claims of certain States and Territories, including that of Nevada, said act of 1882 providing "that no higher rate shall be allowed for the services of said forces and other proper expenses than was allowed and paid by the United States for similar services in the same grade and for the same time in the United States Army serving in said States and Territories, and for supplies furnished in the same country"; and

Whereas there were no other soldiers of the United States Army serving in said Territory and receiving less pay than that received from all sources by troops raised in the Territory of Nevada; and

Whereas the said board of examiners reported that with the "extra pay" allowed under the Territorial act "their compensation from all sources did not exceed, if, indeed, was equal to, the value of the money received as pay by the troops stationed elsewhere," and that in passing the Territorial act "the legislature was mainly instigated by a desire to do a plain act of justice," and that the term "bounty," as used in the Territorial act was in fact a payment made to captains of military companies "for expenses incurred by them in enlisting, lodging, and subsisting the men prior to their entering the United States service * * * and under the circumstances this expense was economical"; and

Whereas said board of examiners rejected said disbursements because of the technical reason they were described in the statute as "bounty and extra pay," notwithstanding the findings of fact made by said board show that such disbursements were in no way a gratuity, but, upon the contrary, were in one case "economical" and in the other a "plain act of justice"; and

Whereas both the said board of examiners and the Court of Claims in considering the matter of such disbursements felt bound by general laws, and hence could not consider conditions and circumstances peculiarly applying to Nevada alone and to the equities of her case; and

Whereas by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1899 (30 Stat. 1206), the Secretary of the Treasury was required "to investigate and report to Congress * * * the amount furnished by the State of Nevada or by the Territory of Nevada and assumed by said State * * * with such interest on the same as said State has actually paid, together with what amounts have been heretofore paid by the United States"; and

Whereas in pursuance of said act of Congress of March 3, 1899, the Secretary of the Treasury transmitted to Congress "a statement of the case made by the Auditor of the War Department," from which it appears that, inclusive of the interest paid by the State to January 31, 1899, there remained "the sum of $462,441.97 for which the State has not been reimbursed"; and

Whereas since the furnishing of said statement made in compliance with said act of Congress no material part of said sum "for which the State has not been reimbursed" has been paid; and

Whereas the Senate of the United States upon four several occasions passed measures providing for the reimbursement of the State of Nevada in full for all her said war expenditures, and appropriate committees of the House of Representatives, after exhaustive investigations, in every instance recommended the passage of such measures; and

Whereas the State of Nevada has not as yet been reimbursed for its said expenditures, but has continually been compelled to pay interest upon the original debt incurred: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate and the assembly, That it is the sense of the Legislature of the State of Nevada that if, as would appear to have been determined by the board of war examiners and the Court of Claims, a strict legal obligation does not rest upon the Government of the United States to reimburse the State of Nevada for the expenditures by it assumed and incurred for military purposes in keeping open the overland mail route to the Pacific coast during the time of the War between the States, that in equity the Government of the United States should reimburse the State of Nevada for such expenditures, and that in addition thereto a moral obligation is imposed to make such reimbursement, for the following reasons:

First. That the use of the words "bounty and extra pay" in the Territorial statute were misnomers and did not express the real purpose of such act.

Second. That the debt was contracted by Territorial officers created by act of Congress and were in fact Federal officers.

Third. That the acts of the Territorial legislature were submitted to the President and the Congress and were not disapproved.

Fourth. That the Territorial officers in incurring the original debt acted in a great emergency and pursued such methods as were best calculated to accomplish the result required.

Fifth. That in calling upon the people of the Territory to accomplish a great war measure by assuming the obligations of statehood, the State was bound to assume the debts and obligations of the Territory in the first instance, and by approving the constitution the President and the Congress ratified the action of the people of the State in the second instance.

Sixth. That by assuming the obligations of statehood Congress was relieved from an expense of Territorial government vastly in excess of the entire amount assumed and paid by the State of Nevada for war expenditures made upon request of the proper military officers of the United States, and for which it asks reimbursement.

Be it further

Resolved, That the action of the State officers in presenting a memorial to Congress for the reimbursement of the State of Nevada, of date December 5, 1927, be approved; be it further

Resolved, That the Congress be, and it hereby is, petitioned to provide for the reimbursement of the State of Nevada for the disbursements by it made and referred to in this resolution; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the United States Senate, to the House of Representatives, to the Comptroller General of the United States, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

MORLEY GRISWOLD,
President of the Senate.
V. R. MERIALDO,
Secretary of the Senate.
D. H. TANDY,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN W. WRIGHT,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE SENATE RULES—REGULATION AND REGISTRATION OF LEGISLATIVE COUNSEL OR AGENTS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I submit a resolution proposing a change of the Senate rules. This is the resolution to which I referred on yesterday. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and lie over.

The resolution (S. Res. 145) was ordered to lie over under the rule, as follows:

Resolved, That the standing rules of the Senate be, and they are hereby, amended by adding a new rule, as follows:

RULE XLI. REGULATION AND REGISTRATION OF LEGISLATIVE COUNSEL OR AGENTS

Upon motion of any Member of the Senate, supported by a majority vote, any designated employee may be summoned to appear before the Committee on Rules and required to give the names of all persons for whom he is employed, or if an employer, the names of those who were employed by him to influence legislation during the current session of Congress and an account of all expenditures incurred or promised for the purpose.

WELCOME TO COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 146), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate all expenses incurred by the Senate, including necessary expenses for travel for Senators appointed by the Vice President to attend the ceremonies incident to the welcome accorded Col. Charles A. Lindbergh at Washington, D. C., on June 11, 1927.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7009) to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE, TYLER COUNTY, W. VA.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Calendar No. 300, the bill (H. R. 9186) authorizing the Sistersville Ohio River Bridge Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near Sistersville, Tyler County, W. Va. A similar bill passed the Senate and went to the House. In the meantime the House had passed this bill and sent it here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE NEAR LOUISVILLE, KY.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9660) authorizing the city of Louisville, Ky., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near said city, and that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

There being no objection, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEED OF BETTER VENTILATION IN CAPITOL BUILDING

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial from this morning's Washington Post entitled "Curing a cold."

I have been disturbed about the atmosphere in the Senate Chamber and the atmosphere in various Senate committee rooms. I have observed, for instance, in the Committee on Commerce and the Committee on Appropriations the vilest air. Senators meekly submit to the exposure of their persons to bad atmospheric conditions.

I speak seriously, because I believe that the life of every Senator here is shortened by the way in which he lives in the Capitol.

I have had pending for a long time a measure seeking to remodel the Senate Chamber, in order that outside air may be admitted. I speak of it because of my interest in the health of my colleagues. I think even the Republicans on the other side of the Chamber ought to live longer than they are likely to survive under the conditions which prevail here.

I believe this editorial is so sensible that it should engage the serious thought of every Senator.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Tuesday, February 14, 1928]

CURING A COLD

Cornell University now discloses that it, too, has joined the popular search for a cause and cure of the common cold. For over a year the staff of its medical college has been treating a selected group of students to twice-a-week baths in the ultra-violet rays of a mercury vapor lamp. This group, it is said, shows a decrease of 50 per cent, as compared with an untreated group, in both the number and severity of colds.

The experiments were started to test a theory that, since people rarely suffer from colds in summer, sunlight has something to do with their immunity. The ultra-violet rays, like sunlight, change the bactericidal power of the blood, increasing its resistance to the germs that cause colds. They also, it has been found, improve the condition of the skin which protects the delicate tissues of the body from bacteria always seeking entrance. Thus the door is closed to persons who have been treated to the rays of the mercury vapor lamps, and if the bacteria do succeed in forcing an entrance, the blood itself is better equipped to destroy the intruders.

The physicians interested in the experiment say that the lesson to be learned therefrom is that people must take greater advantage of sunshine, nature's ultra-violet storehouse. Yet stranger things than this may follow if the theory is found to be sound. Possibly ultra-violet ray service stations may come to be part of civilization. Not every one can get as much sunlight as he needs, but if he could drop into such a service station for a few minutes twice a week, the need would not be so pressing.

INVESTIGATION OF PUBLIC-UTILITY CORPORATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 83) authorizing an investigation of public-utility corporations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] if he would object to a unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon the pending resolution at 5 o'clock to-day?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should not object.

Mr. WATSON. I asked the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] this morning if he would object, and he said he would not.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, what is the proposition?

Mr. WATSON. To vote on the pending resolution at not later than 5 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. NORRIS. It might be that under such an arrangement one Senator would take up all the time between now and 5 o'clock. I do not want to delay the vote; I am as anxious as anyone to get a vote; but with that kind of a blanket agreement some one might be deprived of an opportunity to speak on the resolution.

Mr. WATSON. We can perhaps limit the length of speeches, if the Senator desires, after the Senator from Georgia concludes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I rather think we shall be able to reach a vote this afternoon.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is insisting on proceeding with the consideration of the alien property bill unless we can reach some kind of agreement. I think if we could proceed for a while with the discussion of the resolution, and it should look like we might reach a vote, the Senator from Utah might be agreeable to permitting us to proceed with the discussion, and if we could do that I think it would be very pleasing to both sides.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would suggest that we go on until about 2 o'clock and then take up the matter.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, has any thought been given to a consideration of the calendar some day this week?

Mr. CURTIS. It is my intention to ask for an adjournment just as soon as the pending resolution is out of the way, so that we may have a morning hour, when the calendar can be taken up.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, inasmuch as I have proposed an amendment to refer the investigation to the Federal Trade Commission, and inasmuch as the power of that commission to conduct the investigation is questioned, I desire to call the attention of the Senate briefly to the powers of the commission.

Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission act declares:

That unfair methods of competition in commerce are hereby declared unlawful.

The same section empowers and directs the commission "to prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations, except banks, and common carriers subject to the acts to regulate commerce from using unfair methods of competition in commerce," and gives the commission full power to make inquiry and to conduct investigations into the acts of all corporations engaged in commerce.

I desire specifically to call the attention of the Senate to the power of the Federal Trade Commission to make economic investigations. It is provided in section 6 (a)—

That the commission shall have power—

(a) To gather and compile information concerning and to investigate from time to time the organization, business, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce.

And the commission may require reports and answers to specific questions in the compilation of such information, the only corporations that are excepted being banks and common carriers, which are otherwise regulated.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate specifically to the power given the Federal Trade Commission under the Clayton Act, by which the commission is given jurisdiction over violations of sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of that act, and is specifically granted power in certain cases to investigate holding corporations or the ownership by one company of the stock of another where the effect may be to substantially lessen competition between the companies and to restrain commerce or tend to create a monopoly.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the further power conferred upon the Federal Trade Commission to investigate so-called interlocking directorates in cases where one person shall at the same time be a director in any two or more corporations engaged in interstate or foreign commerce other than common carriers and banks or banking, which throughout the act, of course, are excepted from the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission because they are otherwise regulated.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to certain rulings of the Attorney General. It is alleged that by reason of a provision in the appropriation act for the fiscal year 1925, and under the appropriation act for the current fiscal year, the Federal Trade Commission has not the power upon the request of a single House of Congress to make the inquiry covered by the Walsh resolution. The provision of the appropriation act referred to reads as follows:

No part of this sum shall be expended for investigations requested by either House of Congress except those requested by a concurrent resolution of Congress; but this limitation shall not apply to investigations and reports in connection with alleged violations of the antitrust acts by any corporation.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the opinion of the Attorney General given to the Federal Trade Commission upon Resolution No. 163 of the Sixty-ninth Congress, and particularly to the opinion of the Attorney General upon Resolution No. 34 of the Sixty-ninth Congress, in which the Attorney General has ruled that the Federal Trade Commission has the power to make precisely the same kind of investigation called for by the pending resolution.

The only question, Mr. President, that has arisen grew out of the rider on the appropriation act which limited the power of the Federal Trade Commission to expend moneys appropriated to it to conduct an investigation ordered by the resolution of a single House of Congress unless that resolution required an investigation of some act declared to be or supposed to be under the condemnation of the antitrust acts.

Mr. President, I propose to take this case out of any possible controversy by announcing now that I shall offer at the end of the resolution substantially the following amendment:

The commission is hereby directed to inquire whether any of the practices hereinabove enumerated constitute unfair methods in commerce, tend to the restraint of trade and commerce and/or to create a monopoly, and/or constitute a violation of the Federal antitrust laws.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator contend that the authority which he read from the law a moment ago or the amendment which he intends to propose, if agreed to, would authorize the Federal Trade Commission to inquire into the activities of corporations in politics and elections?

Mr. GEORGE. Entirely so; and I wish to say to the Senator that I agreed with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] yesterday in his interpretation of the resolution which he offered in 1925 and which was adopted by the Senate on February 9 of that year. He meant to inaugurate an inquiry into the activities of utility corporations in order that it might be disclosed whether those utilities were engaging in efforts to control elections and particularly whether they were using money or other influences corruptly in order to control the regulatory bodies that have jurisdiction over the utilities themselves.

The Senator from Montana himself yesterday made very specific his own interpretation of what he conceived to be the proper direction that the committee would give that inquiry under that provision of the resolution. His interpretation is in to-day's RECORD.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have been somewhat disturbed, I will say to the Senator, about the question whether the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission under the act which created it would empower it to enter into a field that might be regarded as wholly reprehensible but not necessarily a violation of the antitrust laws.

Mr. GEORGE. Suppose the antitrust law is alleged to be violated by a corporation which comes under State control; suppose it is true that the State commission itself is elected or its election is influenced by such corporation; and suppose that the corporation is by the commission thus elected permitted to have a free hand in carrying out its own policies, it seems to me to be too clear to admit of argument that we would have an instance where even the expenditure of money or the use of agencies of publicity to influence and control elections in that case would be directly related to the very activity that the Federal Trade Commission was created to investigate and to prevent.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Georgia whether the report of the Federal Trade Commission in obedience to the Norris resolution covered that aspect of the investigation?

Mr. GEORGE. I will say to the Senator that the report of the Federal Trade Commission in response to the Norris resolution did not cover it, because it was not required by the resolution itself; that is to say, it was not required of the Federal Trade Commission to report whether any such practices tended to restrain trade or commerce or tended to create a monopoly or constitute a violation of any of the Federal antitrust laws.

Mr. GLASS. I understood the Senator to say that he gave the same interpretation to the resolution as was given to it by the Senator from Nebraska——

Mr. GEORGE. I did; and I think it a fair one.

Mr. GLASS. That the resolution required that sort of an inquiry.

Mr. GEORGE. I think that was a fair interpretation of the resolution.

Mr. GLASS. But the Federal Trade Commission did not give that interpretation to it.

Mr. GEORGE. The Attorney General took a different view of it and excluded investigation under that particular clause of the resolution, not because power was wanting, but because the commission had no authority to use its funds in view of the rider that had been attached to the then applicable appropriation bill and to a prior appropriation bill.

Mr. President, combinations in restraint of trade and commerce may be created in various ways, but monopolies can exist in the United States in no utility subject to State power and regulations unless the State fails to exercise its power or unless the State power is misdirected or misused. In other words, it is most difficult to conceive of a monopoly or of restraint of trade and commerce by a utility company subject to State regulation if the State is exercising its regulatory power in a proper way. It follows that a monopoly can be brought about through the corrupt use of money in controlling the election of State officers charged with the duty of regulating the business in which the monopoly exists.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator, in pursuance of the inquiry that I made a while ago, let me say that I think it is well to have the Senate understand that the Federal Trade Commission did not have available funds, perhaps, to pursue the inquiry that was ordered by the Norris resolution, because its chairman, Mr. Humphrey, came before the Appropriations Committee and prevailed upon the committee not to appropriate sufficient funds; and the same Mr. Humphrey appeared before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate at this session and sought again to prevail upon the committee not to appropriate funds for an investigation by a single House of Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. But he was unsuccessful this year.

Mr. GLASS. He was unsuccessful this year, as he should have been in all the other years.

Mr. GEORGE. That leads me to say that I am not defending the Federal Trade Commission. I hold no brief for the commission or any member thereof. I must admit that many of their rulings and certain of their acts would seem to merit the condemnation that has been pronounced against them; but, so far as this matter is concerned, I am considering simply what the commission did, and I am calling attention to that for the reason that the inquiry and investigation thus far made by the commission in this matter is not partial but is rather critical of the utilities.

Mr. President, with the amendment which I shall offer in the event my first amendment prevails, no question can arise, as I think, touching the Federal Trade Commission's power to make the investigation required.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the amendment which he is about to tender or, at least, will tender before he concludes does not need the support of the House of Representatives, but would motivate the commission or require it to make the investigation though it were a resolution adopted by the Senate alone?

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly. I wish to say, Mr. President, that if the election of any officer—State or Federal—is undertaken, the resolution should direct the committee of the Senate or the Federal Trade Commission to pursue the investigation within proper limits. If it be the purpose to investigate the election of Senators, I suggest that the Senate now has a committee which has full power to investigate the elections of all Senators nominated in the primaries of 1926 and elected in the fall of 1926, and if it should be desirable to extend that committee's power to include other elections I apprehend that that could be done. But the proper inquiry here, Mr. President, is whether utilities subject to regulation by State bodies have controlled or corruptly influenced the election of State commissions, thereby securing commissions favorable to the utilities, and have as a result built up monopolies engaged in unfair practices, imposed unjust rates upon the public, and sold to the public worthless securities.

If we direct the Federal Trade Commission to make inquiry into all of these alleged practices and to report whether such practices tend to create monopoly or constitute violation of the Federal antitrust law, the investigation may as well be made by the Federal Trade Commission as by a committee selected from this body.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. It seems to me, as I view the situation, that the investigation of expenditures of money to corrupt elections, especially the election of Senators, ought to be conducted by a committee selected by the Senate or by one of its standing committees. I have understood that the paramount purpose of this resolution was not to investigate expenditures for the election of Senators, but for the purpose of determining whether the Sherman or Clayton Acts have been violated, or whether monopolies or monopolistic tendencies have been developed which have restrained trade, and particularly whether the power organizations have formed combinations in restraint of trade, or have by their conduct come under the denouncement of any of the laws to which the Senator refers.

I am not quite clear why we should combine an inquiry into campaign expenditures or the corrupt use of money in effectuating the election of Senators with an examination of whether this power organization is a trust and has violated the antitrust laws. Why may we not differentiate them, and if we feel that an investigation should be made to ascertain whether there have been corrupt elections, whether money has been improperly expended in the election of Senators, delegate that duty to the Senate committees? I confess, however, that I do not quite understand why we should commingle the activities of the body that shall be assigned to the investigation, whether it be a committee chosen by the House or by the Senate, or whether it be the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am in thorough accord with the observations and views of the Senator from Utah. I simply did not desire to restrict this investigation. If the Senate wishes to join them, I offer no objection; my amendment proposes that the investigation be made by the Federal Trade Commission.

I think, of course, we ought not to investigate State elections; certainly State elections wholly unrelated to the choice of the regulatory commissions having jurisdiction over these utilities. My view is that we should not in this resolution undertake to investigate the campaign expenditures for a President, or for a Vice President, or for a Senator. My view certainly is that we ought not to undertake to investigate the election of Members of the House of Representatives under a simple Senate resolution without inviting the House to concur in it or to disagree from it; but I am not going to raise objection. I am merely calling attention to it; and I am merely saying that every election in the United States, from that of constable in the remotest precinct in the farthest State from Washington to that of the President of the United States, may be investigated and will be investigated by the Federal Trade Commission under the resolution containing the amendment which I have now suggested; and that commission will, of course, be compelled to say whether money or influence used in those elections was intended to and did have any reasonable relationship to the regulation of rates and to the control of utilities in every part of the United States. Leave it as broad and as general as the encasing air, as it was, indeed, when the Senator from Montana introduced it. I have stated that the resolution should be properly restricted, but, so far as I am concerned, I am going to leave it just as the Senator himself desires to have his resolution stand.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what the Federal Trade Commission did in this case.

The Federal Trade Commission entered upon its investigation some time after the passage of the resolution; the Senator from Montana has been good enough to say about five months thereafter, and I presume he is correct in that statement. But the Federal Trade Commission pursued the investigation, and the result of its investigation is contained in two volumes—one already published and before the Senate; the other merely in proof-sheet form, and which the Senate has not had an opportunity to examine.

While the Senator from Nebraska originally called for an investigation of the General Electric Co. and those companies affiliated and connected with it, yet his resolution was in such form as to demand an inquiry into the whole electric business in the United States—that is, into all of those companies generating electric energy or power for commercial distribution or use. The Federal Trade Commission did, in fact, examine the whole industry. Their own report shows—and I have it here before me, and I shall be glad to furnish the page if Senators desire it—that they investigated 1,500 privately owned utility companies, 63 holding and investment companies, 440 municipal departments for the generation of electric energy, or, as they themselves show, they investigated the companies producing 96 per cent of the electric energy going into commercial uses in the United States. The companies not examined are small producers throughout the country. They did not investigate all of these producing companies as fully as certain of the larger companies. They went into a general investigation of the whole electric industry, however, and the chapters themselves—and I read only the large type—indicate the scope and character of the work actually performed by them.

I read from part 1 of the report:

Extent of General Electric control.
General Electric interests in electric power companies.
Comparative importance of General Electric power interest.
Stockholders in common and interlocking directorates.
Development of General Electric interests.
The Electric Bond & Share Co.
The American Gas & Electric Co.
The American Power & Light Co. group.
The Electric Power & Light Corporation group.
The Lehigh Power Securities Corporation group.
The National Power & Light group.
The Southeastern Power & Light Co. group.
The United Gas & Electric Corporation.
The Northeastern Power Corporation and affiliates.
Description of other power groups.

Power company groups not falling within these general groups, or in these holding companies or mergers, as they are called, are then investigated. Under this head they investigated—

The Stone & Webster group.
The Byllesby group.
The Hodenpyl-Hardy group.
The Cities Service or Doherty group.
The Barstow group.
The White group.

And various other undesignated groups—that is, groups having no well-known designation.

The North American Co.
The Insull group.

Extensive developments and large local operations are also investigated in volume 1 of this report.

The other volume, the second part of the report filed by the Federal Trade Commission, goes very much more exhaustively into the whole electric industry; and I wish to read to the Senate merely some of the black-letter types at the heads of the chapters in this portion of their report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is there any contention that the field which was covered in these reports was not exhaustively covered? And if there were facts omitted, is it contended that further investigation would reveal matters not elicited in the examination thus far?

Mr. GEORGE. There is none, except that it is contended that the resolution under which this investigation was made did not call for certain things that are now demanded by this resolution, and that is in a measure correct; but it is a further examination into precisely the same thing that the commission examined in the first instance under the Norris resolution.

Mr. KING. And would tie onto it?

Mr. GEORGE. And would tie onto it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, in pursuance of the inquiry made by the Senator from Utah, has the Senator from Georgia had time or has he taken the pains to examine critically, to analyze this report of the Federal Trade Commission, in order to convince himself that the examination was thorough, that all essential questions were asked, and that no essential question was omitted in the examination?

Mr. GEORGE. The report does not consist of questions and answers, but of findings. These reports contain more than 550 pages of the conclusions reached and of the facts developed, but they are not in the form of questions and answers.

Mr. GLASS. What I had in mind, I will say to the Senator, is that an investigation may be had by the Federal Trade Commission or any other commission which is reluctant, which is not designed by the investigators to develop all the facts; and the mere findings of a commission of that sort would not carry much weight with me.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to say to the Senator that there is no evidence in this report that that course was pursued by the Federal Trade Commission. I said yesterday, and permit me to repeat, that the investigation is thorough; it is searching; it is critical at many, many points of the utilities and points out that the States have not full power to control these utility corporations in fixing rates on power passing in interstate commerce and in issuing and selling securities.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator said that the investigation was thorough. I am wondering how he could tell whether it was thorough or not unless he himself examined the evidence.

Mr. GEORGE. I said that I had not access to the questions and answers; but there is no charge that this examination, so far as it went, was not fairly made and that the results of the examinations are not beneficial to the Senate. The Senator from Montana himself has conceded so much, his position being that the investigation did not go as far as his resolution would go, and in all respects it did not, of course.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand that thoroughly; but the Senator makes the bald statement that the investigation was thorough. I submit that I do not see how he can state that the investigation was thorough unless he has in some way examined the evidence.

Mr. GEORGE. I have examined this report.

Mr. WHEELER. I know; but an examination of the report means nothing——

Mr. GEORGE. I have examined the report; I have examined it carefully. The report concerning all of the matters which the Federal Trade Commission did investigate is thorough, in my judgment. I do not undertake to say that all of their conclusions are correct. They may not be verified. They may not stand the test. But certainly the commission has gone into the question referred to it, it has widened the scope of its investigation as far as possible, and to the extent that it felt authorized to make the investigation has made an investigation, and no impartial man can say that its report is a partial or one-sided report. It bears all the evidences of being a reasonably thorough investigation of the field, as far as the commission investigated it.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not see how the Senator can say it was a thorough investigation. I can understand how he can say the report is thorough, but I can not see how he can say that the investigation was thorough when he does not know anything about the evidence.

Mr. GEORGE. I can say that an investigation is thorough as a result of an examination of the conclusions and results reached, and it is my judgment that this was a thorough examination as far as it went. It might have been pursued in various directions further, I grant, but so far as the investigation went, it was thorough, and I judge that by the conclusions the commission reached, by the facts it found, by the evidence it brought here.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. The question raised by the junior Senator from Montana is one which I have heard discussed a good many times; that is, that if this investigation should be conducted by a Senate committee, there would be a record of the questions and answers. Is there any reason why the Federal Trade Commission, if it were to make such an examination as this, should not have such a record for the benefit of those who desired to study the conclusions of the commission and form a personal opinion regarding the reports?

Mr. GEORGE. None, Mr. President; but I do want to say this: That the only investigation that will ever be of any value to the Senate in framing legislation will be an investigation upon which the Senate can depend, and it will be a finding of fact worthy of acceptance upon the most rigid and critical examination of the facts. There can be but one reason for this inquiry into the utilities, and that is to lay the foundation for legislation if legislation is necessary. That is the full position of the Senator from Montana. I do not think it a wise policy for the Senate to embark upon the course of conducting investigations merely to find out whether legislation is necessary, but, at the most, the only reason for this investigation, or any other economic investigation, is to find the facts upon which the Senate and the House can determine whether legislation is necessary and, if necessary, what kind of legislation should be passed. Neither the Senate nor the country can safely rely upon any investigation that does not present facts, and present facts in such manner that we can base intelligent action upon the facts.

That is what the Federal Trade Commission attempted.

I said yesterday, and permit me to repeat, that if the conclusions reached by the Federal Trade Commission in the examination already made are upon examination found to be justified, found to be correct, the Senate is in possession of sufficient information to enable it to do all that it can do under the Constitution to enable it to regulate rates of electric energy or power passing in interstate commerce and to enable it to regulate the utilities and holding corporations to the extent that they engage in interstate commerce in the flotation of their securities across State lines. We find conclusions sufficient in this report itself to justify legislation if upon examination we find that the conclusions reached by the Federal Trade Commission are correct, because the commission takes the decided position in its report that the States have not the power, or at least that the States have not exercised the power, effectively to control these utility corporations. They do not dogmatically state that to be the case, but the whole tenor of the report is in that direction. They quote, even at great length, the articles of Professor Ripley; they quote from other authorities who undertake to point out the weakness in the regulation of utilities at present and indicate how the utilities may properly be controlled in the future.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Yesterday there were very serious reflections made upon the bent of mind of certain commissioners. I suppose that any Member of the Senate who has the feeling that that is an untrustworthy tribunal might be dissatisfied with conclusions formulated by the commission upon the result of a star-chamber examination. That is the reason why I ask the Senator if there could not be included in his amendment the further proviso that the record should be made a public record, so that anyone who sought to review the evidence and to determine whether the conclusions reached were fair and just conclusions would have an opportunity to study the record to determine for himself whether the conclusions were wise or not.

That is the thought I have in mind; that is the chief criticism, if I may say so to the able Senator from Georgia, I have heard about his proposal, in contradistinction to that of the Senator from Montana, that in one case there is a star-chamber proceeding, without any record to enable one to determine for himself whether the conclusions are proper conclusions or not. So I have hoped that perhaps the Senator might broaden his amendment so as to guarantee to us that if there is a record made it shall be a record which each of us may study, if so disposed.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have not given thought to that suggestion; but, so far as I am concerned, I would have no objection to providing that the Federal Trade Commission be required to file with its report the transcript of the evidence upon which its findings are based.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that would be wise?

Mr. GEORGE. I have no objection to it. I have not given thought to it, but I have no objection to it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that that very thought is the controlling influence with some Senators. If an investigation is had by an adversary commission, with its preconceived notions about these things, if, as is held by some Senators, the evil genius of this entire report was a commissioner or commissioners who were averse to making a thorough investigation, of what account are the conclusions of a report of that sort to a Senator who thinks that way about it?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think the value of the report is in the accuracy of the findings made by the commission.

Mr. GLASS. But how does the Senator know that the findings are accurate unless he has had an opportunity to examine the report of the whole inquiry?

Mr. GEORGE. He may more immediately inform himself if he has the report on which the findings are based, and I want to say this to the Senator, that this suggestion has not been made to me, but I am quite willing to accept it, or I am quite willing to offer an additional amendment that the Federal Trade Commission be required to report each 30 days after the passage of this resolution, and finally upon the completion of its work, and that it be required to file with its reports the transcript of the evidence upon which the reports are based.

Mr. GLASS. I think it very unfortunate if that shall not be done in substantiation, if it may be confirmed, of the report we already have.

Mr. GEORGE. I have not investigated to see whether there is any countervailing statute or law that applies to the Federal Trade Commission, but so far as I know it would be within the power of the Senate, and would be very proper for the Senate, to direct that the evidence upon which the reports themselves are based be transmitted to the Senate for use by the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, I think it would add tremendously to the strength of the Senator's position if his amendment were to include that item. There can be no doubt, if the Senator will permit me, that there are Senators here who feel as the Senator from Virginia has just expressed it, that there is an evil genius upon the commission. But if the reports provided for by the amendment of the Senator from Georgia shall include the stenographic report of the evidence, then I concede that any opposition which might develop to the Senator's position would be largely swept away.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I give notice that I shall offer an amendment, if my original amendment shall prevail, providing that the Federal Trade Commission be required to transmit to the Senate for the use of the Senate the transcript of the evidence upon which its findings already submitted to the Senate are based, and that along with its reports under the resolution it transmit to the Senate the transcript of the evidence upon which its reports and findings are based.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand it, the objection is made by certain Senators that the commission is hostile. That being true, of what benefit would it be to have the stenographic report of the questions asked by a commission hostile to the examination, and which was not open to the public, and where the people had no representative sympathetic with the investigation? If it is intended, in line with the suggestion of the Senator from New York, to have an investigation by this commission which will meet the expectations of those like the Senator from Virginia, who believe that the commission can not be trusted, why should the amendment not go further—although I will state that I am not in favor of the amendment at all—and provide that the hearings shall be open to the public, and that a special representative of the people who desires a thorough and fair investigation shall be employed to propound the inquiries?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am not interested in how the investigation is held if the questions and answers come here or even if the findings come here, because I propose to test the findings of any committee or commission as best I can. I would have no objection, I will say to the Senator, but I do not know what regulation or law may stand in the way of it, and so far as I am concerned I will content myself with offering the amendment that I have already indicated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator referred a little while ago to the report made by the commission. Will the Senator please, for my information if for nobody else's, give me the date of that report?

Mr. GEORGE. Part I of the report of the Federal Trade Commission under the Norris resolution was submitted to the Senate on February 21, 1927.

Mr. SIMMONS. Since then there have been several other or additional reports.

Mr. GEORGE. There has been one other report, and that was submitted to the Senate January 13, 1928, and referred to the Committee on Printing. February 1, 1928, the committee ordered the report to be printed, and that report is yet in proof-sheet form.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not yet available to Senators?

Mr. GEORGE. It is not yet available to Senators.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator another question. Has he read the two reports?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I have read the two reports.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish now to ask the Senator if in reading those reports he discovered anything that indicated to his mind a bias on the part of the commission against the interests of the public in this question?

Mr. GEORGE. I did not. I discovered, as I think, severe criticism of certain of the utilities. I do not say that these companies did not deserve the criticism, and I do not indicate that the observations and findings made by the commission are not entirely justified. I do not mean that there is in the report any intemperate language, but I mean that the findings of the commission itself upon its survey of the industry may in some particulars be controverted by the utility companies. As I said, I have never defended the general policy of the Trade Commission and do not now defend it, but there is no indication in the report that the commission undertook to evade any inquiry or undertook to withhold or suppress any statement that related to the public interest. It seems to me to be a fair and reasonably exhaustive report. Indeed, I think it a most valuable report. It is the basis and foundation of any investigation that may be made of electric and gas utilities in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. In other words, the Senator means to tell us that he, as a trained lawyer, has read that report and that he does not discover any evidence of partiality on the part of the commission hostile to the interests of the public?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not. It is true that the commission finds generally that a monopoly did not exist, but it sets out all of the facts that constitute the basis of the conclusion reached by it. I have found no evidence, so far as I have been able to study the report, of any partiality against the interests of the public.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Virginia pardon me just a moment further?

Mr. GLASS. Very well.

Mr. GEORGE. I yield further to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The commission is composed of five members, is it not?

Mr. GEORGE. Five members—bipartisan.

Mr. SIMMONS. Three of one party and two of the other party?

Mr. GEORGE. The law reads that the commission shall not consist of more than three members of any one political party, as I recollect it.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that in any investigation at least some member of the commission might be reasonably supposed to have the public interest at heart.

Mr. GEORGE. I should think so, if the Senator pleases; and I know that the particular investigation here does not disclose a want of sympathy by the commission for the public welfare.

Mr. SIMMONS. I regret very much that I have not had the opportunity to read the report as thoroughly as the Senator has, but I understand from the Senator that one part of it is not yet available to the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. Except in proof form.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Before I yield to the Senator from Virginia let me say that there may be in the report particular conclusions that might not meet with the approval or the judgment of many eminent and patriotic men. There may be in the report particular conclusions that would be strongly controverted, and I apprehend will be strongly controverted by the interests which are supposed to be hostile to the public—that is, by the utilities.

But what I am saying is that, on the whole report, it does not to my mind disclose any bias against the public interest, whatever may be the general attitude of the Trade Commission or of any member thereof.

Now I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. It was not very important except that I have been endeavoring to appraise the real value of the report. Assuming that it was conducted by persons who did not want to discover the truth and who did not make ample and sufficient efforts to disclose the facts, is it conceivable that they would ever embody in the report anything to indicate that fact to a Senator or to any intelligent examiner of the report?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not suppose they would. If it be assumed that the five gentlemen——

Mr. GLASS. I asked the question because I really wanted to discover the value of the report.

Mr. GEORGE. I have tried to be as explicit upon the point as I can, and I will say to the Senator that whoever makes an investigation of the electric industry, whatever his character, whatever his capabilities, will have to cover the ground covered by the Federal Trade Commission in its report. He must cover the same ground, and he must cover the ground in substantially the same way, though he may not reach the same conclusion in every instance. That is the value of the report. The value of the report can not be questioned if it is subjected to faithful study. I regret that I have not myself had time to make a more thorough study of it. But the value of it can not be questioned. I do not think it has been questioned. I think the most that is said about it is that it was made by a hostile commission, and that it does not go far enough because the power of the commission was not invoked with respect to certain matters about which the Senate now desires information.

Mr. GLASS. Regardless of the reason why it may not have gone far enough, if as a matter of fact it did not go far enough, of what account is its report to the Senate?

Mr. GEORGE. It went as far as the Senate asked it to go, and it might have been well thought by any committee or any commission that it was not justified in transcending its authority. I think it is of real value to the Senate, particularly if the conclusions reached, which indicate the necessity of Federal control both of electric energy in interstate commerce and of some sort of additional control of the securities which are issued and sold in interstate commerce, are verified. That is to say, if its conclusions are correct I think the report is of especial value to the Senate.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] contends that the original investigation did not cover the financing of the various public-utility corporations, did not cover as exhaustively as he now thinks desirable the holding companies and the pyramiding and the whole scheme of financing. I say very frankly that the commission did not go as far as it might have gone under the pending resolution. Of course, I have already said that the commission did not undertake to inquire into the use of money to influence public opinion on the question of public ownership of utilities or to control elections, because it was ruled by the Attorney General that they could not use their money for that purpose.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator if his resolution provides for gaining the information which was not brought out by the report as to financing and pyramiding and that sort of thing?

Mr. GEORGE. Entirely; because my proposed amendment to the resolution does not modify and does not qualify the scope of the resolution as introduced by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. May I ask the Senator just a question? He referred to an opinion of the Attorney General a moment ago as to the right of the electric-power corporations to use the corporate funds in counteracting the clamor for municipal and State and Government ownership. I have never seen that opinion. I did not know there was such an opinion in existence. Does the Attorney General suppose that such corporations have no right to expend any money, however reasonable the sum may be, in exposing the fallacies and shortcomings and disasters of municipal and State and Government ownership?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no. The Attorney General did not go into the merits of that inquiry.

Mr. BRUCE. How far did he go, in the legal sense?

Mr. GEORGE. The Attorney General merely advised the Federal Trade Commission that in view of the rider attached to the appropriation bill the commission could not use the money to make the investigation.

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, that is a different thing entirely.

Mr. GEORGE. But it expressed no opinion on the merits at all.

Mr. President, I have no disposition to detain the Senate longer, as other Senators want to speak on the matter. I wish to emphasize, before I pass from the Federal Trade Commission, that I have no apologies for it, but its work is entitled to be judged by its actual value, and I undertake to say that no man will say that its work is not of value, that it is not instructive, or that it is not helpful to the Senate itself. I undertake to say that ultimately its findings before us will be subjected to criticism more by the utilities than by anyone, however extreme his views may be, representing the public interests in the controversy.

But the fact is that on February 9, 1925, we asked the commission to make the investigation. It made it, and in January, 1927, it filed a partial report. In January, 1928, it filed its completed report, containing more than 550 pages, and not even Senators have had an opportunity to read it. Now we are proposing an additional investigation of the same utilities, without having acquainted ourselves or familiarized ourselves with the investigation already made by the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to recur to the statement just made that we directed the Federal Trade Commission to make a certain inquiry and that it has made that inquiry. The authority to make the inquiry which we directed them to make is found in Senate Resolution 329 of the Sixty-eighth Congress. If the Senator will permit me, I shall be glad to read it. It is as follows:

> Resolved further, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate and report to the Senate to what extent the said General Electric Co., or the stockholders or other security holders thereof, either directly or through subsidiary companies, stock ownership, or through other means or instrumentalities, monopolize or control the production, generation, or transmission of electric energy or power, whether produced by steam, gas, or water power; and to report to the Senate the manner in which the said General Electric Co. has acquired and maintained such monopoly or exercises such control in restraint of trade or commerce and in violation of law.
> The commission shall also ascertain and report what effort, if any, has been made by the said General Electric Co. or other corporations, companies, organizations, or associations, or anyone in its behalf, or in behalf of any trade organization of which it is a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, to influence or control public opinion on the question of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electric energy is generated and distributed.

That is what we asked the Federal Trade Commission to inquire into and that is all we asked the Federal Trade Commission to inquire into.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand that; but I have indicated the scope of the inquiry made and the reason why the Federal Trade Commission said that it was obliged to give it that broad scope.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I rose simply to call attention to the statement of the Senator that we had directed the Federal Trade Commission to make this general inquiry and that it had done so.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; but the inquiry was necessarily broad, and the report shows why it was broad. I have said, and the record bears me out, that they called for reports from companies producing 96 per cent of all the electric energy generated in the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no controversy about that at all.

Mr. GEORGE. Then why does the Senator wish to say and why does he wish to leave the impression that the commission pursued a very limited inquiry?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not so stated. I said in my opening statement that in order to ascertain the facts it was necessary for them to inquire into the relations sustained between the General Electric Co. and the other companies.

Mr. GEORGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought his purpose in reading the resolution was as I have stated.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. As the second report is not open to the inspection of the Senate, I should like to know what the conclusions of the commission were with reference to the extent that electric light and power companies had sought to influence public opinion in relation to State or Government ownership.

Mr. GEORGE. The commission did not examine into that question because of the ruling of the Attorney General that it could not so use its funds, but I will say on that point, though I have no disposition to go into it, that the last chapter—and it is an exhaustive chapter—in part 2 of the report bears upon the question of propaganda and the attempt to influence public opinion by the activities of the utility companies. The report itself concludes with it. It does not condemn it; but, though it had no authority to go into that field, it does point out explicitly in the concluding chapter that if activities in that direction undertaken by the utilities are to have any just weight with the public they must be conducted out in the open; that they must not be covered up under the names of writers and educators.

I do not think it can be successfully controverted that the Federal Trade Commission has ample power to continue the inquiry now sought under the pending resolution and to complete its inquiry with respect to everything enumerated in that resolution. That, I think, is true under the general powers which it possesses. The only question that could or might arise is as to its power to use the money appropriated to it to defray the expense of a portion of the investigation demanded. That, I think, is completely covered by the amendment which asks the commission to inquire whether any of these practices constitute violations of the Federal antitrust laws.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate again to the fact that 1,500 companies privately owned, 63 holding-investment companies, 440 municipal lighting departments reported to and were examined by the Federal Trade Commission under the Norris resolution. Those concerns produced in 1924, the year previous to the adoption of the Norris resolution, 96 per cent, measured in kilowatt-hours, of all of the commercial electrical energy produced in the United States.

I wish to call attention to the fact that not a single utility company has passed a dividend on its preferred stock or made default in the payment of any of its bonds or securities, so far as this record discloses. I dare say that no other great industry in the country can present a like record to the people of the United States.

But it is said, on the contrary, that they have paid the interest upon their bonds and securities and have paid dividends upon their preferred stock by an unreasonable exaction out of the public in the way of rates. Be it so, Mr. President, and, if it is so, then the utilities ought to be regulated; then the pertinent inquiry is what authority should regulate them? Nine per cent only of the power generated by all of the electric companies in the Union passes in interstate commerce; 91 per cent is absolutely intrastate. Who ought to regulate it? Of the 9 per cent that passes in interstate commerce nearly 2 per cent is a mere interchange of power; that is, one company over in Alabama, for instance, transmits a certain quantity of power over into Georgia and Georgia in return pays it back in kind, the companies having physical connections between their distributing systems. So only about 7 per cent of all the hydroelectric energy and of all the steam-produced electrical energy in the United States goes into interstate commerce. Are we going to turn over to a Federal agency the power to regulate a great industry in the United States merely because some 7 per cent of its product passes in interstate commerce?

Where are those who yet insist that the States have some rights? Where are those who do not know that when we give a Federal agency power to regulate electrical energy passing in interstate commerce that agency will do ultimately what the Interstate Commerce Commission has done in the case of railroad rates, namely, raise the rates within the States themselves?

The Senator from Montana said that not a single bondholder had been called before the committee to protest against the adoption of the pending resolution; that not a single user of electric current had been called to protest against the adoption of the resolution. I say that the Senator never called a single American housewife nor a single user of electricity, nor did he call a single bondholder of any of the utilities in the United States, gas or electric, to support his resolution; and yet this resolution is offered for and on behalf of the users of electric current and of the holders of the bonds of the utility corporations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator were favoring this resolution, whom would he call to speak for the householders? The householders are not organized, while the utility interests are organized. We are supposed to represent the householders and consumers.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, I understand that, Mr. President; but I am making the statement I have made preparatory to one that I am going to make.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me ask the Senator again whom would he call to represent the householder?

Mr. GEORGE. Had I offered this resolution, I would have called before the committee users of electric current, of electric energy, who claim that the rates are exorbitant, and I would have submitted their testimony to the committee. I would also have called purchasers of utility bonds, worthless or depreciated bonds, if such are available.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, the bondholder is really not deeply concerned about this question. He has security based upon the actual physical assets of the property secured by mortgage. He is not the one who suffers at all; the one who suffers is the man who goes out and buys the common stock. Let me say that the bondholders, however, were, as a matter of fact, represented in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly. Now let me ask the Senator a question. He made his position very clear yesterday. Did he not say that the two purposes he had in mind or the two possible results to be obtained in the event legislation was found to be necessary at all were, first, a control over the rates for electric current, and second, a regulation of the issuance of bonds or stocks or other securities in interstate commerce?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the Senator has not quoted me accurately, although the general idea is there.

Mr. GEORGE. I meant to quote the Senator accurately.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I said that we were seeking to protect the holders of the junior securities of the utility companies and the consumers of electrical energy.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly; and I am saying that the Senator did not call, nor is the evidence here in support of his resolution——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is quite right about that, because the consumers are not organized, and they have no representative that could be called; and it is exactly the same way with the holders of the junior securities. They are scattered all over the country, and they are not organized. The great bond-dealing houses do not deal in their securities at all. They come and speak for the bondholders and holders of the preferred securities, the senior securities.

Mr. GEORGE. I was not criticizing the Senator for not calling them, but he was criticizing the opposition to his resolution for not calling them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; no.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator to do so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was pointing out, or trying to point out, that the only people who appeared to oppose the resolution were those who are interested in not having any investigation, namely, the representatives of the utilities companies and the representatives of the holders of the senior securities, and a gentleman representing the State commissions.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia overlooked the fact that there are a great many very large consumers and users of electrical energy, and that some of them might very well have been placed upon the stand in this hearing. Whether they were part of a general organization or not I apprehend is a matter of no importance.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me say that I conceived that that would be a question very much more appropriately presented to the committee when it is appointed than presented to the Interstate Commerce Committee on the question as to whether or not an investigation should be ordered. If the investigation proceeds in a general way, abundant material is at hand upon that particular subject.

Mr. BRUCE. But the Senator's point was that nobody was put on the stand representing the consumers because there was no organized association of consumers. I say that was immaterial. With due deference to the Senator, I say that that was no substantial reason, because, of course, there are many large users of electric power and energy who are interested in the question of rates and interested in all other questions that appertain to the practical workings of electric-light companies; and the Senator could have put some of those individuals or some of those corporations on the stand.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Can the Senator tell us about how some of them would be representative of the state of affairs throughout the country?

Mr. BRUCE. Why, certainly. If you got a certain number of users of electric light and power here from the different States of the Union, you could get them from all 48 States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, I could have conducted this investigation before the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. BRUCE. I should have been delighted to furnish the Senator from Montana with the names of half a dozen or a dozen or, perhaps, two dozen very large users of electric light and power in the State of Maryland alone.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Montana will understand that I was not so much criticizing him as I was trying to avoid what seemed to me to be an unjust criticism of those who oppose his resolution; but I do want to say that the Senator unquestionably could have called consumers; rates could have been gone into, at least to a certain extent, if he wished to; and I say that the Senator might well have called the utilities commissioners from all of the various States. The rates, however, are matters of public record.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But does not the Senator recognize that that is the very question, or at least one of the most important questions, that this investigation is to go into if it is ordered?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I understand.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why should I go out and try all those questions before the Interstate Commerce Committee?

Mr. GEORGE. I understand that, Mr. President; but we are not going to investigate them for an idle purpose. Our investigation, if it is fruitful at all, must lead to some legislation; and the Senator indicated the scope of the legislation himself, provided any legislation was found to be necessary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me remark, Mr. President, that I said before the committee, and I am glad to repeat now, that I hope it will be demonstrated that no legislation upon the subject is necessary at all.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator to state that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I likewise want to repeat what I said there, that it is my judgment that many of the evils complained of, many of the abuses which undoubtedly inhere in this industry at the present time, will be corrected by the publicity that is given by these hearings.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand. I know what the Senator said; but I say that we are not engaging in idle work here. We are not engaging in the business of furnishing publicity and facts to the various States. I do not think it is my function merely to furnish them facts, and to draw to their attention certain conditions.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Pardon me just a minute; I wish to conclude. If the investigation is to bear any fruit, it must result in legislation. There can be but two forms of legislation. One is to control the rate to the user of electric energy and gas, because the resolution covers both; and I was proceeding to point out that only 9 per cent of electric energy passed in interstate commerce; that actually about 7 per cent only passed into the hands of the consumers; that is to say, that a fraction amounting to nearly 2 per cent was mere interchange of power.

Now I want to go further. A fraction of 1 per cent only of manufactured gas in the United States passes in interstate commerce. I will not vote for any investigation if the single proper purpose it may have is to bolster up a demand for legislation when there is no more need for legislation than is presented in support of this resolution. You propose to regulate all the gas industries of America, all of the gas manufacturers of America, when here in your own record is the indubitable proof that a mere fraction of 1 per cent of the manufactured gas produced in the United States passes in interstate commerce.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an inquiry?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I will.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Upon what statement from any source does the Senator make the statement that we propose to regulate every gas industry in the United States?

Mr. GEORGE. If this resolution results in legislation, it must result in, first, the regulation of rates upon electric energy and gas in interstate commerce; second, the regulation and control of the sale of securities. The moment the Congress of the United States regulates the flow of a fraction of 1 per cent of the gas across State lines, you place in the power of a Federal agency in Washington the power to raise the cost to the consumer of more than 99 per cent of the gas which never passes a State line. That is why I say it. I say it because you did it with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator, does he want to abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, I am not talking about that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What powers does the Senator want to take away from it?

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator wants to lead me afield in that, I shall be glad to discuss it; but in the interest merely of time I will say that the Interstate Commerce Commission, of course, had to come into existence. It came into existence because nearly all of the business of the carriers was interstate, or at least because a great per cent of that business was interstate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but the Senator is complaining because we did something.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I am not complaining. I am saying that the inevitable result of your legislation is to give to a commission at Washington the power to raise the rates on the users of more than 99 per cent of all the manufactured gas produced in the United States; and why? Because in our great anxiety and desire to legislate and to create bureaus to reach out and control industry we are willing, though that part of the industry that we can legitimately control is less than 1 per cent, to give to an agency power over the 99 per cent which never passes into interstate commerce.

You had to have the Interstate Commerce Commission. You had to have it, and you did have it, when in the course of time so much of the business of the carriers was interstate, until Congress was obliged to intervene; but you do not have to have similar action here, and that is what I am talking about, because only 9 per cent of the electric energy produced in this country passes the line of a State. Less than 1 per cent of artificial gas ever goes across a State line; and when you come to the securities, it is stated in your own hearings, and uncontradicted by any evidence, that only 3 per cent of all of the corporate securities in the United States consist of the securities of the electric and gas companies, and only a negligible fraction of those securities ever passes a State line.

I am speaking here for the commissioners of my State, for the men who appeared before your committee, for the men who, you say, can not be trusted to regulate these utilities and these powers. I am speaking for them because they know they have been stripped of all their power to regulate the railroads within their States; and they know, as the commissioner from Wisconsin told the Interstate Commerce Committee, that they are about to be stripped of the power to control telephone rates within the States.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I understand that the objection the Senator makes here is—and I want to be clear about it—that if this investigation is made, it will lead to legislation which the Senator opposes. If I am correct in that, I am just wondering what difference it would make, then, whether the investigation were made by a special Senate committee or by the Federal Trade Commission so far as the results attained are concerned. If there were a fair investigation by the Federal Trade Commission, would there not be just as much likelihood of legislation as though the matter had been investigated by a Senate committee?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think so; and that brings me to the last thing that I want to say.

There is the widest difference between an investigation by a tribunal charged with the finding of facts in an orderly and systematic way and an investigation by any legislative committee. Those who appeared before the committee in opposition to the resolution know, however much we may reassure ourselves by saying that if the industries be sound the result of the investigation will be to help rather than to hurt them, the inevitable effect of a Senate investigation upon industry.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was not sure that I understood the Senator from Alabama, and therefore perhaps I did not correctly understand the Senator from Georgia. Do I understand the Senator from Georgia to conclude that legislation is not so likely to follow upon an investigation made by the Federal Trade Commission as upon one made by a Senate committee?

Mr. GEORGE. No; if the investigation went to the facts, I must assume, of course, that the facts would be the same in any event, and those facts would, of course, control us as to the type or kind of legislation, if any, that we would propose.

Mr. BORAH. Then the legislation would as likely follow in one instance as in the other?

Mr. GEORGE. As likely in one instance as in the other. But what I am calling attention to is that those men who appeared here, and especially the representatives of the States, were, in my judgment, within their rights in appearing. Their position is that they ought not to be interfered with through Federal legislation, because they are able to handle the situation, and that more will be lost by Federal interference, in virtually the infancy of the industry, so far as interstate business is concerned, than can be gained by the interposition of the Federal Government into this field at this time. I conceive that that was a legitimate reason and justification for their appearance here.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think most of us, perhaps all of us, will concede that the representatives of the State utilities commissions were within their rights, not only within their rights but were performing their duty in interfering here; but the question of whether or not there should be legislation, or whether or not the amount of control which we have over this industry will be sufficient to justify legislation, will be a matter to come up after the legislation shall be proposed, it seems to me.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes; certainly; but the Senator probably did not hear all of the remarks of the Senator from Montana yesterday in presenting the case and in identifying those who appeared in opposition to his resolution. I grant that all the Senator from Idaho has said is entirely correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The remarks made by the Senator just before he was interrupted a moment ago prompt me to ask that the Senator recur to them. The Senator expressed the view that an investigation of this industry would be disastrous to it, as it had been to other industries subject to investigation.

Mr. GEORGE. No; not disastrous, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Rather disadvantageous, at least. I remember that we investigated the Steel Trust at one time, but I do not remember that that seriously affected the development of the steel business. The House of Representatives investigated the Money Trust at one time, but I do not remember that the banking interests suffered very materially. It will be recalled that a very rigorous investigation of the insurance business was conducted in the State of New York some time ago by a committee headed by ex-Secretary Hughes. I do not remember that the insurance business suffered. But in each of those cases some abuses that had crept into the business were corrected.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I did not mean to say that certain investigations have not been profitable.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; but the Senator did say that they were destructive of various industries that had been investigated.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this is what I meant to say: That if the Federal Trade Commission, specially clothed with the power to make this investigation, particularly fitted to do this identical work, can not be trusted to do this work, then no man in this body is justified in voting a single penny of the people's money to support that tribunal. No man can justify his vote to continue it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, the thing that just now is puzzling me is why the Senator is willing to have any investigation at all, if legislation in pursuance of such an investigation is going to be as disastrous as he indicates he thinks it will be.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Virginia has misunderstood me. I did not mean to say that legislation would be disastrous to the industry.

Mr. GLASS. Not to the industry; no. The Senator—and I concur in everything he says on that phase of the matter—has vehemently and with great reason inveighed against the concentration of power in Federal commissions here at Washington, and has in this case particularly opposed delegating to any Federal commission the power to regulate rates for electricity and for gas and power produced by these organizations. Will not legislation, which may ensue from the investigation which he proposes, have just as disastrous an effect in that regard as legislation which may ensue from an investigation by a Senate committee? Why, then, if that is so, does not the Senator oppose any investigation?

Mr. GEORGE. I did not say that.

Mr. GLASS. I am asking why the Senator did not say that.

Mr. GEORGE. Because I am about to say what I wish to say.

Mr. GLASS. Well——

Mr. GEORGE. It is entirely legitimate for an officer who holds and exercises a part of the sovereignty of his State to come before any committee of Congress and say to the committee, "In our judgment, the industry that you are now proposing to regulate federally should not be brought under Federal control." That is what the commissioners from the States who appeared here did say.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will suffer an interruption, those commissioners came before us and told us that we ought not to conduct the investigation, that they are doing the job, and doing it well.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But Professor Ripley tells us that the inefficacy of the State commissions is indubitable, and the Federal Trade Commission tells us that they do not meet the situation. Why should we not inquire about which of them is correct about the matter? Why should we not find out what the truth about the matter is?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I take it for granted that if legislation is not to follow, the real object of the investigation is to show that the proper way to regulate industry is by publicity.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Whipping them backward and forward with propaganda?

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Abandon the Constitution; wipe off the statute books the laws, and say that from this time on we are going to set up a propaganda agency here in the Senate and regulate business by propaganda. That is the conclusion we must reach from the argument.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly so.

Mr. GLASS. Then, Mr. President, again I say, if that be so, why have any investigation at all?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia let me finish what I was going to say along that line?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I called attention to the fact that less than a fraction of 1 per cent of manufactured gas passes over any State line, that less than about 7 per cent of electric energy actually passes State lines, and I called attention to the fact in that connection that the State commissions from the various States, through their representatives, came here and opposed any investigation, and they opposed it upon the ground that Federal regulation is not now demanded or required. They certainly submit facts which are pertinent here, and which we ought to take into consideration when we vote to have any investigation by either the Federal Trade Commission or by a committee of the Senate, as I concede very frankly.

I am not going so far myself as to say that no Federal legislation may be necessary; I am not going so far as to say that Federal legislation may be entirely unjustified; but I do think that it is pressing the matter too far to undertake the Federal regulation of business enterprises if a negligible percentage of their products only pass in interstate commerce. If the tendency now manifest in the electric industry continues, and more and more electric energy passes from State to State, then it may be necessary to have, and even the utilities themselves may demand, as the carriers would now be compelled to ask, Federal control. But the representatives of the States have brought to us facts that are well worthy of our consideration. At least they show that neither branch of the Congress of the United States should conduct an investigation into an industry, and before that is completed, go into another investigation through a different channel and through a different tribunal.

It seems that the industries named here may well say to the Senate, "You are not justified in investigating us at all, but you certainly are not justified in taking the investigation out of the tribunal where you yourself placed it, and putting it into the hands of a Senate committee for the purpose of furnishing head lines and propaganda to arouse public clamor for legislation by the Federal Government."

The utilities take the position that in view of all that has happened they do not resist an investigation so much, but they say, "Let it go on here in the same tribunal in which the investigation was begun."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that they were asking that the matter be sent to this tribunal; that they were willing that it should be so sent?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I did not say that.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. I did say what is in the record—and the Senator is a member of the committee—notably, a statement by Mr. Owen D. Young, that they do not object to, in all the circumstances they favor, an investigation, but they do object to an investigation by a Senate committee. I think I am fairly interpreting it.

Mr. WHEELER. But let me say to the Senator that the position taken by most of the others who appeared was entirely different from that Mr. Owen Young took.

Mr. GEORGE. Perhaps so. I was quoting what I thought was a responsible voice.

Mr. WHEELER. Most of them took the position the Senator is taking on the floor here to-day with reference to the fact that no investigation should be had, because it would injure the industry; secondly, they took the position that we did not have any authority to go in and investigate the industry at all.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not taking that position, and I am not taking the position that the investigations fairly and properly made will hurt the industry.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. A moment ago the Senator from Idaho wanted to know if the same legislation would not follow the investigation whether it were made by a Senate committee or by the Federal Trade Commission, and the Senator from Virginia reechoed that query. If that is true, and those who are sponsoring the resolution want Federal legislation, then why do they object.

Mr. GEORGE. There would be no reason.

Mr. CARAWAY. They say the same legislation will follow and the same results will follow. Why are they so anxious to set up a special committee to investigate?

Mr. GEORGE. There would be no reason if legislation really be the object of the inquiry.

Mr. GLASS. But, as a matter of fact, I did not say that.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not understand the Senator to say it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I presume I am mistaken. Because the Senator kept asking the question over and over again if the same legislation was to follow, and that had been the assertion, I took for granted he was advocating it.

Mr. GLASS. That was the contention of the Senator from Georgia. I am still perplexed to know, if the Senator from Georgia please, if the same measure and character of legislation may follow the investigation by the Federal Trade Commission as will or may follow an investigation by a Senate committee, diastrous in either event in its consequences, why he does not oppose any investigation at all. I am still perplexed to know why that is so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me further?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think the Senator from Virginia recognizes the difference between the two investigations sought. The sponsors of the one by the Senate lay down its chief virtue to be one of publicity. They want to control the industries of the country by threatening them with unfavorable publicity. It may be that they are entitled to be so controlled. I do not know. It may be that publicity is a wise way to have government. I do not know. If it is, though, I am confident that we ought to abolish the Constitution and cease to sit as a Congress, because we are not presumed to be publicity agents. If publicity is what they want we had better hire a publicity agency. They are to be had at so much a day and come very much cheaper than the Congress.

In fact, while we are talking about publicity, the one that has given this resolution the most publicity, the one which has been, as far as I have been able to read the papers, the most insistent in its demand for a senatorial investigation, is headed by a man who has had an office here ever since I came to Congress. The first time I ever saw him was at the time he was devoting his energies to changing the constitution in my own State, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union were opposing him because they said he was doing it in the interest of the saloon. That was the high ideal which inspired him to invade my State and try to change our constitution. He lost about 10 to 1. He has been running a publicity agency here in behalf of some of these enterprises and ideals.

I hate to say this, because it may be that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] will be compelled to vote for the Senate resolution if I do.

But the Constitution undertook to guard against the unreasonable invasion of a man's private rights. It said that an unwarranted and unreasonable search and seizure was forbidden. We are told now that that is all wrong; that no man ought to have any privacy; that everything he does ought to be controlled by public propaganda. If that is the wisest way to govern the country, we ought to say so. Let us abandon the idea that we want regulation, and let us say, as is undoubtedly intended, that we want propaganda.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the theory has grown, and to a rather remarkable extent, that almost everything done by an individual, especially I may say by a corporation, should be made known, and that if the conduct of the individual is bad the neighbors ought to know it, and if it is good it not only will not hurt him but will help him. That is the philosophy which we are accentuating in our efforts here.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the very people who advocate it keep on the statute books a law which provides that they may sue for libel if anyone says anything about them.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the Senator from Arkansas for his observations.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if there is anything in favor of the Federal Trade Commission making the investigation on the theory that they have already acquired a lot of knowledge and their research men have gone into the various items involved in the proposed investigation, and perhaps they are better prepared to continue the investigation than a Senate committee would be, which would have to begin de novo? Is there anything in that suggestion?

Mr. GEORGE. I should think so. I tried to emphasize that. Perhaps the Senator was out of the Chamber at the time. My conclusion was that if the particular investigation should not be carried on by the Federal Trade Commission, for any reason whatever, then it ought not to be intrusted with any investigation. Of course, the work which it has already done is indispensable to an inquiry even such as is suggested, because to begin the inquiry where the resolution proposes to take it up, without all that has preceded it in the investigation, would be not quite meaningless perhaps, but would be of little or at most of slight value to the Senate or the other House in an attempt to frame legislation.

Mr. GLASS rose.

Mr. GEORGE. Perhaps I have not answered specifically the Senator from Virginia or cleared up in his mind as specifically as I might have done my own position.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that he has not done so, and I excuse my repeated interruptions of the Senator upon the ground that I do not contemplate making any address upon the subject.

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to have the Senator interrupt.

Mr. GLASS. I want to know how I shall vote on the question. I frankly say that the Senator has not cleared up my perplexity, as indicated by my inquiry. Now I would like to ask the Senator if the scope of his proposed amendment is not quite as extensive as the proposal of the original resolution?

Mr. GEORGE. It covers exactly the same ground, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. Then I am the more perplexed that the Senator is willing to advocate the amendment which he proposes. I quite agree with the Senator in everything he has said about Federal control. I am as utterly opposed to it as it is possible for any human being on earth to be. I quite agree with him in his very vigorous and conclusive defense of the public utilities commissions, or, rather, of the State agencies in appearing here to protest against Federal control.

But if Federal control is as inevitably to follow the resolution of the Senator from Georgia after an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission as it is the resolution of the Senator from Montana after an investigation by the Senate, I can not see why the Senator from Georgia does not oppose any investigation whatsoever. Is it merely because the investigation by the Senate committee will get some large degree of publicity and because the investigation by the Federal Trade Commission will get no publicity at all—because there is no human being in the Senate or outside the Senate who knew the contents of this report which has been presented here now of the Federal Trade Commission, and they will not know any more about the contents of any other report that the Federal Trade Commission may make. If it is a mere question of publicity, that is no justification on earth for an investigation at all.

Mr. GEORGE. I myself do not think so. I am going to be very frank with the Senator and say that in my judgment no investigation is necessary further than has been made.

Mr. GLASS. I do not agree with the Senator that no investigation at all is necessary, because I have no confidence in the world in the report that has been submitted.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will allow me to finish my statement——

Mr. GLASS. Certainly I will.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think that any investigation is necessary, nor is it really justified further than the investigation already made. That is my conclusion. But a demand has been made here for it. The resolution has been introduced. The matter has been brought before the Senate and the country. I think sufficient facts have been developed and I accept the work thus far done by the Federal Trade Commission to justify me in suggesting that Federal interposition in two respects might well be made in the case of these utilities.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I will yield, though I desire to conclude, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the Senator think that the honest thing for those who are really opposed to the investigation is just to vote against an investigation rather than attempt to send it to the Federal Trade Commission, knowing that under the law and under the rules of the Federal Trade Commission no investigation can be held?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not know that under the law no investigation can be held; but I do know that under the law an investigation can be held, and I do not, therefore, agree with the Senator's statement.

But I want to say to the Senator very frankly that I would rather have the investigation made by a dispassionate and impartial tribunal than made by the most capable Members of this body, not because of any lack of confidence in the Members of the Senate, but because we all know that we are here weighted down with duties of one kind and another, and I do not believe that a thorough, searching, exhaustive investigation by a Senate committee can be as unbiased, can be as complete, can furnish the facts upon which we would desire to stand, as might be furnished by an impartial tribunal with all of the machinery necessary to a full investigation.

I do not think there is justification for Federal regulation and, therefore, that an investigation by the Senate is not justified if the object of that investigation is to control the rates for the relatively small percentage of electric current passing in interstate commerce. I do not think that a Federal investigation is justified if the result of that investigation is to control the negligible proportion of only 3 per cent of the total of all securities in the United States passing in interstate commerce.

The men who appeared in opposition to a Senate investigation represented not merely the utilities companies but they represented the public service commissions in all of the States of this Union that now have such commissions. They also represented all the savings banks of this country, with their combined capital assets of more than $9,000,000,000, some $350,000,000 of which are invested in the securities of utility companies. They represented all of the life-insurance companies of this country, with their total capital assets of $14,500,000,000, with approximately a billion dollars of their policyholders' money invested in the securities of utility companies. These men—and surely they have the right to appear here, because they represent interests scattered all over the Nation—said to us, "If you want an investigation, let it be conducted by the Federal Trade Commission or some other regularly established commission, but do not give to the investigation a political or partisan complexion." They gave reasons which appeal to all impartial minds outside of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is quite evident, I think, that an investigation of utility corporations is going to take place, either by a committee of the Senate, as provided for in the resolution of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] or by the Federal Trade Commission, if the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] shall prevail. I think it can be demonstrated very readily that if the investigation shall be attempted by the Federal Trade Commission the result will be in the most important particulars practically negligible.

I stated to the Senator from Georgia yesterday that I agreed with him that the decision of the Attorney General was erroneous, and yet I have always conceded that it was only a matter of opinion. It is sufficient to say that the Attorney General in passing upon that portion of the resolution adopted by the Senate which provided for the investigation by the Federal Trade Commission of the political activities of the General Electric Co. and its various subsidiaries held that that provision of the resolution was null and void so far as an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission was concerned.

That portion of the resolution was almost an exact copy of the similar portion of the resolution which has been offered by the Senator from Montana. I wish to read the two resolutions and then to read the opinion of the Attorney General, which, it seems to me, provides without a shadow of doubt that no investigation can take place by the Federal Trade Commission.

The resolution of which I was the author, which was adopted in the Sixty-eighth Congress, contained two provisions, as has already been stated. One directed the commission to investigate the activities of the General Electric Co., its stockholders, and security holders, to ascertain whether they constituted a monopoly in the electric-light business. The other portion of the resolution read as follows:

> The commission shall also ascertain and report what effort, if any, has been made by the said General Electric Co. or other corporations, companies, organizations, or associations, or anyone in its behalf, or in behalf of any trade organization of which it is a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, to influence or control public opinion on the question of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electric energy is generated and distributed.

Now, let me read from the resolution offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which is before us:

> The committee is further empowered and directed to inquire and report whether, and to what extent, such corporations or any of the officers thereof or anyone in their behalf or in behalf of any organization of which any such corporation may be a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, have made any and what effort to influence or control public opinion on account of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electrical energy is generated and distributed.

There is practically the same language as in the resolution introduced by me; at least, everyone must concede that the two contain the identical idea.

Now let us see what the Federal Trade Commission did. When they had that language presented to them in the resolution which was adopted by the Senate in the Sixty-eighth Congress they referred it to the Attorney General and asked his opinion about it. They referred at the same time several other proposals in the resolutions, but I am merely going to read that portion of the opinion of the Attorney General which applies to this particular subject. Senators will realize that it applies definitely to the resolution now before the Senate; there is no difference.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KING. Is the Attorney General's opinion based upon substantive law?

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to take that question up, I will say to the Senator, and if he will peremit me I shall read from the opinion. It will show of itself that he refers particularly to the organic law creating the commission. So all the talk about a rider on an appropriation bill is immaterial. He held that the commission did not have authority to conduct the investigation under the organic law which created it.

Mr. KING. How could the commission investigate to the extent it did if the organic act forbade it doing so?

Mr. NORRIS. I think, perhaps, the Senator was not present when I undertook to explain that there were two divisions of the resolution. I called attention to both of them, but I will do so again.

The first portion of the resolution called upon the commission to investigate and to ascertain the monopolistic tendencies of the General Electric Co. and its subsidiaries. The second called upon the commission to ascertain whether those companies had spent any money for propaganda purposes, for the purpose of controlling the avenues of publicity, and for the purpose of meeting the arguments for or against public or private ownership. The Attorney General held that they had a right to investigate as to the first subject of inquiry, but they had no right to investigate as to the second. Then I showed that the resolution now before the Senate is almost in identical words—and a portion of it is in exactly the same words—as the second division of my resolution under which the Attorney General held the commission had no authority to investigate. Now, I am going to read that portion of the opinion of the Attorney General which applies to the particular resolution now before the Senate.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I think that this is a very important subject, and I should like to suggest, if the Senator will yield to me for that purpose, the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not do so at this time, because few Senators who are not now present will be moved by what may be said, and they will not obtain the whole of the argument if they return in response to the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WHEELER. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire now to quote from the opinion of the Attorney General. The first portion of the resolution which the Attorney General is discussing contained still another proposition, namely, to investigate the Tobacco Trust. The other portion of the resolution was attached as an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky providing for an investigation of the Tobacco Trust. The Attorney General is speaking now of that portion of the resolution containing in itself two parts which I had tacked on as an amendment:

The recitals of the second part of the resolution allege a violation of the antitrust acts by a named corporation and its subsidiaries. For the most part the investigation directed is appropriate to develop truth or falsity of the charge. In carrying out this resolution regard should be had for the admonition already given, to the effect that the inquiry should be limited to facts and circumstances tending to show any unlawful restraint of interstate trade and commerce. Under the provisions of the antitrust acts only restraints upon the production of electric energy for transmission over State lines and upon the interstate transmission of electric energy, or the monopolization thereof, may be properly investigated under the resolution in question.

Now I come to the part of it holding the other part of the resolution to be void.

There is serious question, however—

Says the Attorney General—

as to the requirement that the Federal Trade Commission shall ascertain and report the efforts, if any, made by the corporations in question through the expenditure of money—

He uses almost the same language himself; part of the way he does quote the language—or through the control of avenues of publicity, to influence or control public opinion on the question of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electric energy is generated and distributed.

The relationship of such facts, assuming their existence, to a charge of violation of the antitrust acts is not apparent. Indulging all presumptions in favor of the validity of the resolution under the organic act, I am still unable to find authority for such an inquiry. All other features of the investigation properly may be made.

Senators, that is the law to-day. Whether we believe it is right or wrong, that is the opinion of the Attorney General, never appealed from, no way to do it as far as this commission is concerned, and final; and under that opinion the Federal Trade Commission will never take a step in accordance with the language I have read you, contained in the Walsh resolution. In other words, it is a nullification of any investigation.

There is, therefore, but little difference between having no resolution and passing this resolution with the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Georgia; and, of course, that is what the Electric Light Trust want. They are riding very easily and safely.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HOWELL. The statements being made by my colleague are so to the point, and of such importance, that I am going to ask my colleague to yield while I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I have gotten through with that part of it now, and of course if the Senators who are absent come in they would not hear it, anyway, unless I repeated it. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. President, so much for the technical legal phase involved before us to-day. I can not understand how any man can dispute the proposition. I can not understand how we can expect the Federal Trade Commission to take a single step to investigate the things that are called for in this language. Of course they will not investigate. I understand that the opinion of the Attorney General was written by a man who is now a member of the Federal Trade Commission. I am not charging dishonesty, Senators. I am not charging lack of ability. I am simply stating a legal proposition. I am not making any charge against the Federal Trade Commission. I am assuming that this man was conscientious when he rendered that opinion. He may have been right under the law. At least it is the law, unappealed from and final.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Do I understand it to be the law that the opinion of the Attorney General, in respect of a given statute, is finally determinative of the real meaning of the law?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no, Mr. President. I will make that plain.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is what I want to have the Senator do.

Mr. NORRIS. In this case it is final because we have a Federal Trade Commission that want that kind of an opinion, and of course they will make no effort to violate it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; what I mean is this: They called upon the Attorney General for an opinion, as I understand.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He rendered a certain opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Now, following my former question, under the law is the commission bound to proceed or not proceed according to the opinion of the Attorney General?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think so.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. As a matter of law, I am asking.

Mr. NORRIS. I am answering the Senator's question in that way. I think they could violate and go contrary to the Attorney General's opinion if they wanted to; but, having asked it, I suppose, of course, when they get it they will follow it, and that will be the proper course to take. I am not disputing that. That is what I would do if I were a member of the commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if they did not follow the opinion of the Attorney General, has the Senator any doubt in the world that these public utilities would immediately institute proceedings to enjoin them from proceeding?

Mr. NORRIS. Not a bit.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what they always do. I have a record here of half a dozen such proceedings on the part of corporations.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If they should in a proper proceeding seek to enjoin, then there would be a judicial determination.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; after the lapse of four or five years.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not asking this question in a contentious spirit. I want to know the position as a matter of law.

Mr. NORRIS. There is not any doubt about it.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McMASTER. If the Federal Trade Commission have an opinion from the Attorney General that they can not proceed with this investigation under the law, if they started to proceed, and their expense vouchers went before the Comptroller General, would not the Comptroller General be placed in a position not to allow those expenditures?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. He probably would.

I yield now to the Senator from New York. I hope the Senators will not interrupt me too much, because I want to finish. I do not want to take up too much of the time of the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. May I say to the Senator that I have not interrupted him at all up to this point.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not said the Senator did. I have just yielded to him so that he can do it.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

Does the Senator believe that the Federal Trade Commission has no legal right to proceed in this matter?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I said yesterday that I do not agree with the Attorney General, but my opinion does not control. The Attorney General's opinion does.

Mr. COPELAND. The Federal Trade Commission could determine the matter for itself, could it not?

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but why should men in the Senate quibble over a matter of this kind? Here are the Federal Trade Commission. They said to the Attorney General, "Can we proceed? We ask your opinion." He said, "No; you can not"; and then they turn around and proceed, when everybody knows that the reason they asked him was because they did not want to proceed and were hunting a way to get out of it. That was under the influence of Mr. Humphrey, a member of that commission.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I voted with the Senator from Nebraska against the confirmation of Mr. Humphrey.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COPELAND. I think I was one of a very small number to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. I remember that our number was small, but it made up in quality what it lacked in quantity.

Mr. COPELAND. Modesty prevents me from saying anything further on that subject; but, Mr. President, there are other men on this commission, are there not?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Are they not honorable men?

Mr. NORRIS. As far as I know, they are.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me remark that Mr. Myers, who wrote this opinion, is on the commission now.

Mr. COPELAND. Is there any reason why the other three men on the commission are not honorable men?

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is not; but why should this commission, having asked for this opinion and having received it, now go back on it? Of course, if they do, regardless of what the law may be determined to be in the end by the Supreme Court, it will have to go to the Supreme Court before it is determined, because an injunction proceeding would be commenced overnight if they started to proceed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to state for the information of the Senator from New York that Mr. Humphrey is on the commission, and he acquiesced in this ruling before.

Mr. COPELAND. There are two Democrats on the commission. How do they stand?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They are new men, who came on since this action was taken.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me it is a practical question. Either we want to have an investigation, or we do not. If we want to have an investigation, let us vote for the resolution that will bring it about. If we do not want an investigation, let us vote it down, or vote for the amendment which kills it. There is not any use in concealing the truth about it. It looks perfectly clear to me. I am not finding fault with the man who says, "We do not need to have any investigation; we do not want any." He has a right to do that. It is a question with two sides. I concede it. I would not question his honesty, or his wisdom, or anything of that kind; but we are either going to have an investigation or not; and, as I think I have now demonstrated, as a matter of law, if the so-called George amendment is agreed to, we will get no investigation. We might just as well face it.

Mr. President, Mr. Humphrey was a member of the Federal Trade Commission when this other resolution was passed, and he is a member now. He is, I understand, at the present time chairman of the Federal Trade Commission. Of course, everybody knows that Mr. Humphrey would be opposed to anything of this kind. I do not charge him with dishonesty. I do not charge him with lack of ability. He is one of the most courageous men I ever met. He is not afraid of a whole army. He expresses his sentiments and his beliefs and his opinions and his judgments without fear; but if you knew Mr. Humphrey as some of us who served with him for a great many years in the House of Representatives know him, you would know in advance that he never had any sympathy for anything outside of big business. He believes in it. It is his god. He is honest and conscientious about it. I presume he wants to turn the world over to big business, and let the poor people get some employment out of it, and get a few crumbs that they rake off from the marble top or the mahogany top table. He believes in that kind of business. He always has, as far as I know. He stands out boldly and advocates things which mean that. So, when this request went to the Attorney General, it went from a commission dominated by Mr. Humphrey, which did not want to investigate that matter, and they got the very opinion they wanted.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. There is no man on this floor—I have said it many times on the floor and in private—who is franker and in my judgment more anxious to state things exactly as they are than the Senator from Nebraska. Now I want to ask him this question:

If the resolution proposed by the Senator from Georgia outlining the desires of the Senate regarding this investigation is passed by the Senate, directing the Federal Trade Commission to make this examination under the terms outlined here, does the Senator from Nebraska believe that the commission will refuse to do it?

Mr. NORRIS. I certainly do. I do not see how they can take any other course. As far as the language of that part of the resolution I have read is concerned, they are precluded, under the law which controls them now, from doing it. They have the opinion from the highest legal officer in the United States that they have no authority to do it, and they refused before. They refused to make this same investigation under my resolution. That is a matter of history.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Is there any reason why the Senate could not ask the present Attorney General whether or not the Federal Trade Commission is qualified to proceed under the terms of the George amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. I presume we could. We would be asking the same Attorney General who has already written an opinion to the effect that they have no authority to do it.

Mr. COPELAND. I think, if I understand the Senator, this opinion was written by Mr. Myers when he was Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but it came from the Attorney General himself.

Mr. COPELAND. This particular Attorney General?

Mr. NORRIS. A request goes to the Attorney General, and not to an assistant.

Mr. COPELAND. Did it go to the present Attorney General?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. Sargent?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; the same man.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. His signature is to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, nobody expects the Attorney General to write all his opinions, but he is responsible for them. I presume in a general way he knows what they are, and supervises them and agrees with the conclusions reached by his assistants.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KING. The Senator has commented upon the dominating influence exercised by Mr. Humphrey upon the Federal Trade Commission since some time ago. I agree with the Senator, and I recall upon a number of occasions having criticized Mr. Humphrey for the positions which he took. It seemed as though he had been placed there by the Executive—and I do not mean to criticize the President—to inaugurate a different policy from that which had been pursued. when Huston Thompson, and a former Senator from this body, and one other member of the commission, rendered some very valuable and searching opinions. But I want to challenge the Senator's attention to the fact that quite recently Mr. Hunt, a member of the commission, Judge McCulloch, a member of the commission, a former chief justice of Arkansas, and the new appointee from North Carolina, have voted constantly against Mr. Humphrey, so that Mr. Humphrey now stands practically alone. In his efforts, to which reference was made a short time ago, to modify the appropriation for the coming year so as to excise from the appropriation some of the duties and responsibilities imposed by law, he stood alone; he was not supported at all by his conferees. Mr. Van Fleet, as the Senator knows, has left the commission, so that now, with five commissioners, Mr. Humphrey stands alone. I make that observation, not by way of combating anything the Senator has said, but in order that the record, as I understand it, may be brought down to date.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, that statement does not combat anything I have said. I have not charged anybody with doing anything that he thought was wrong. That is not necessary. It is enough to get the facts before the Senate. Whether the commission is better now than it used to be, I am unable to say. It may be. It may be that there are enough of them there to override Mr. Humphrey and override the Attorney General, and prevent an injunction from being issued, but I do not believe it.

If they were all saints, they could not stop a court from issuing an injunction; and that means that even though the case is ultimately decided in their favor, and the Attorney General reversed, they will do nothing until the Supreme Court finally passes on it, and by that time we shall have a different commission, the present members will all be dead from old age, and there will be a lot of new fellows there, who can open another case and start it on its weary way. So, for all practical purposes, even though we concede that the commission are going to go contrary to the advice they got from the Attorney General—we have no right to charge that, but for argument that is admitted—and that they will refuse to obey the mandate of the Attorney General, even though we admit all that, it is going to be five or six years before this investigation even commences.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. If I understand the Senator, his criticism of the present proposal of the Senator from Georgia is that the Attorney General has rendered an opinion which would make it impossible for the Federal Trade Commission to give us the report we desire. Am I right?

Mr. NORRIS. That is practically right.

Mr. COPELAND. I have in my hand this opinion, which was just handed me by the Senator from Montana, and he has marked the language in question, which is this:

There is serious question, however, as to the requirement that the Federal Trade Commission shall ascertain and report the efforts, if any, made by the corporations in question, through the expenditure of money or through the control of avenues of publicity, to influence or control public opinion on the question of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electric energy is generated and distributed.

The relationship of such facts, assuming their existence, to a charge of violation of the antitrust acts is not apparent. Indulging all presumptions in favor of the validity of the resolution under the organic act, I am still unable to find authority for such an inquiry. All other features of the investigation properly may be made.

Then the only thing involved, if that is all there is to it, is that the Attorney General said that it was not proper to inquire into whether this money had been used to influence public opinion regarding public ownership or otherwise.

Mr. NORRIS. To begin with, the Senator has not given us anything new. I have already read that identical language in the hearing of the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the opinion of the Attorney General. Let me read the part of the resolution to which it applies:

The commission shall also ascertain and report what effort, if any, has been made by the said General Electric Co. or other corporations, companies, organizations, or associations, or anyone in its behalf, or in behalf of any trade organization of which it is a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, to influence or control public opinion on the question of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electric energy is generated and distributed.

That is all cut out; they can not do anything with it. Is there anything else in the Walsh resolution? What is there left of it when that is taken out?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The resolution states in the proviso proposed to be inserted on page 3:

Provided, That the elections herein referred to shall be limited to the elections of President, Vice President, Members of the United States Senate and of the House of Representatives.

That is, to investigate campaign contributions, as I understand it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I should think so.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Federal Trade Commission is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. This is asking the creatures of the Senate and of the President to investigate campaign contributions that have been made, if any, to elect Presidents and Members of the Senate. Is not that a good deal like asking a bookkeeper to investigate his employer?

Mr. NORRIS. It has some elements of that similarity in it, I think.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I wanted to call that to the Senator's attention.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when I was interrupted, I was about to read from a speech of Mr. Humphrey made at the Atlantic meeting of the United States Chamber of Commerce on May 20, 1925, at Washington, D. C. He is speaking of these particular resolutions about which I have been talking, the resolution I referred to as mine, and there was another one introduced by the Senator from Minnesota, and one by the then Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. La Follette, asking for various kinds of investigations. He said, in referring to them:

It is perfectly useless to take time to explain the purpose of these resolutions. It is clearly apparent that the primal motive in all of them is political, to advance the personal fortunes of some person, party, or class.

Here is a subordinate official of the Government, directed in his official capacity to make certain investigations by certain resolutions passed by the Senate, denouncing them all as political, and says that "the primal motive in all of them is political, to advance the personal fortunes of some person, party, or class." That is the man who presides over the Federal Trade Commission, which it is desired shall make this investigation of the great Power Trust of the United States, the greatest institution of its kind in the civilized world.

Let us read a little more of what he said in that speech:

I do not charge or even intimate that the Senate or any Senator wishes the commission to do an unlawful act, but all who are familiar with the facts know that often such resolutions are passed out of mere courtesy, upon the request of a single Senator, that often they are passed to prevent the opposition of a single Senator to some other matter. They are often passed rather than listen to a prolonged discussion about them. We all know that frequently such resolutions do not represent the deliberate wish and judgment of the Senate.

Let me tell you something about the history of the particular resolution introduced by me and passed by the Senate. I introduced that resolution, containing the language I have read, and instead of it being passed at the request of a Senator, it had the bitterest kind of opposition. There was arranged over on this side a full-blooded filibuster to prevent its passage, if such filibuster was necessary. I realized that it was going to be impossible to pass it without the filibuster, and the filibuster would kill it perhaps. I was unable to get it up in the Senate. Instead of it being passed simply at the request of a Senator, it never made a single step except against opposition of the bitterest kind, and it was only adopted finally because I was able, after a time of intensive watching and diligence, to find a parliamentary loophole by which I could compel the Senate to take a vote on it, and I knew that if I could get a vote it would pass.

It happened that Senator Ernst, of Kentucky, then a Member of this body, and a candidate for reelection, satisfactory to the management on this side of the Chamber, who wanted to help him wherever they could in his election, thought it would be beneficial to him in his campaign in Kentucky if he could get an investigation in regard to tobacco. So he introduced a resolution asking that the Federal Trade Commission be authorized to make such an investigation. I think that if it had been known that I was watching, and what I was going to try to do, he would never have been able to get that resolution up, but I sat in this Chamber for days and days with my eye on the Senator from Kentucky. He finally got his resolution up by unanimous consent; there was no objection to it; it was going right through; and then I offered my resolution as an amendment. It was in order, and when a roll call was taken the amendment was agreed to, and that is how my resolution got to the Federal Trade Commission.

So the chairman of that commission, when he says that these resolutions come up by unanimous consent, that they are passed merely at the request of some Senator, has another guess coming. He does not know what a hard row that little resolution had to travel, and when it finally got to the commission the very heart was taken out of it by Humphrey in referring it to the Attorney General. Now, we have the same situation confronting the Walsh resolution, and he proposes to send it to the same grave.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. There is a lot in this resolution presented by the Senator from Montana——

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may discuss that after a while. I do not want to take up the time. The Senator from Montana will not agree with the statement. There is not much more in it, but if the Senator from New York thinks there is, for the argument's sake, I am going to admit it. I will simply say that all of that part of the resolution to which I have referred will be as dead as a doornail if we send it to the Federal Trade Commission. That is what I am asserting, and only that. If the Senator can get something else out of it, he is welcome to it, but he can not get anything out of it if the part I have read shall be stricken out. I want to see that investigation made, and through that we shall get a great deal of light, if the right kind of an investigation is made into the electric-light business.

That is the thing the trust is afraid of. If it were necessary, I could almost fill the Senate Chamber with documents to demonstrate the importance of the proposition. I want the investigation to take place. That is the crux of the investigation. There is more in it than in anything else. In my investigation I said, when the Attorney General's opinion came down, "I have no further interest in it. The real life and blood of it is taken out," and the man who, more than any other man on earth took it out, after the stand-pat element here in the Senate could not take it out, was the man Humphrey, now chairman of the Federal Trade Commission.

As I said a while ago, Mr. Humphrey makes no bones about his position on any question. I give him credit for being honest in his convictions and I give him credit for being as courageous as any man I know. I am not charging him with anything that is untrue, in my judgment. He believes in just what he says. He believes in big business. He believes in corporations. He would be glad to see the Electric-Light Trust reach out with its mighty fingers and take in every plant, small and great, in the United States and hold them in one hand, and he would let them run unregulated if he had his way. They could not charge so much as to displease him; he does not believe in that kind of government. The bigger the corporation the more holy it becomes.

So we have that kind of a man on the Federal Trade Commission. That is the kind of a man that Senators desire to head this investigation.

Mr. GLASS. And as a tribute to his audacity, not to say his effrontery, he appeared before the Senate Committee on Appropriations three weeks ago and endeavored to anticipate this very action by having a provision incorporated in the appropriation bill that no single House of Congress should require the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator from Virginia. Knowing Mr. Humphrey as I do, I am not surprised that he would do that. That is the most natural thing in the world for him to do. He did it conscientiously and honestly and knowingly.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me now?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. I dislike to take a single moment of the Senator's time, but he is always so fair and just that he will pardon me for calling his attention to what I think is a mixing on his part of Mr. Humphrey with the Walsh resolution. I share all his feelings about Mr. Humphrey. I voted with the Senator, as he knows, for his resolution and investigation and all that sort of thing. But the pending resolution has in it five things having to do with public utilities. Then almost as an afterthought it says that the committee is further empowered and directed to inquire into the matter of public ownership.

Mr. NORRIS. I said to the Senator when he interrupted me before that if he can get anything else out of the resolution he is perfectly welcome, but the part I have been talking about is out if the investigation goes to the Federal Trade Commission. The Senator can not deny that. Do we want anything else than that?

Mr. COPELAND. Is there anything else in it than that?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; probably.

Mr. GLASS. The question is, Why not include that?

Mr. NORRIS. Why not, of course? Why should we take that out which we do by referring it to the Federal Trade Commission? That is not all. I am not going to stop to argue it, but I think I could make an argument which would satisfy at least myself that there are other things in the resolution to which the reasoning of the Attorney General applies. In other words, if his reasoning is right, then everything in the resolution which does not directly refer to the antitrust laws is illegal and void. I go on the theory that the Senator wants this particular provision in the resolution. If we do, let us not send it to the Federal Trade Commission because then it will be torn out.

But I was talking about Mr. Humphrey. Even if we admit that they have authority, and forget all about the Attorney General and everything that has happened in the past, let us consider the chairman of that commission and the influence which he must have and properly has in that commission. Are we going to submit to a man who holds his ideas the making of an investigation that will be very bitter to his heart under his belief?

After Mr. Humphrey was appointed to the Federal Trade Commission Mr. Paul Anderson, of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, called on Mr. Humphrey and secured from him an interview which he published in the paper. It is an exceedingly interesting proposition covering nearly a page in the paper, in which he pays tribute to him, as I have tried to do to-day, as a man of courage and ability and fearlessness. But he quotes him in several of the things that he said and, without reading the entire article, I am going to quote just briefly some of the things that are included in it as coming from Mr. Humphrey. Mr. Anderson put this proposition to him:

> Another of the changes made by the new majority was to expand the board of review from three members to five. KING—> charged that this move was to enable Humphrey to control it.

That was true. The Senator did charge it and everybody else charged it, and nobody ever denied it. There used to be a board of review of three members. When Humphrey got control he had the board of review enlarged to five. He already had one of the old members, and the two new members made three, and gave him control of the board of review.

> The writer called on Humphrey to obtain his reply to these accusations. He found a blunt, bulky, brisk, and bearded man who spoke with a candor that was almost breath-taking. Humphrey's resemblance to former Premier Poincaré, of France, is remarkable. He is like him physically, mentally, and politically. He is harsh, rasping, and pugnacious.

That is all true.

> There is no doubting his courage. He is a hard man.

Here is what Humphrey said:

> "I certainly did make a revolutionary change in the method and policies of the commission," he snapped. "If it was going east before, it is going west now. I would be ashamed to look a decent man in the face and to admit that I did not change the procedure."

Further on Mr. Anderson said:

> He was asked if that was not exactly what the Federal Trade Commission act intended, that the commission should collect information for Congress and for the Department of Justice.
> "I don't think so," was the terse answer.
> He was reminded that Senator KING had charged him with "packing" the board of review in order to control its decisions.
> "What of it?" he shot back. "Do you think I would have a body of men working here under me that did not share my ideas about these matters? Not on your life. I would not hesitate a minute to cut their heads off if they disagreed with me. What in hell do you think I am here for?"
> Obviously—

> nobody could charge the burly commissioner with evasion or lack of frankness.
> "Listen," he barked. "This is nothing but politics. KING and NORRIS and those fellows are simply hitting at Coolidge through me. They don't like me because they think I helped make Coolidge President."
> "Did you?"

Mr. Anderson made that inquiry.

> "I hope so. I tried hard enough," he answered grimly. "I like to believe I had something to do with it."
> "Have you intimated in your speeches that Commissioners Thompson and Nugent were using the commission to spread bolshevist propaganda?"
> "I don't deny it," he affirmed. "I am willing to stand by what I said."

That gives the Senate an idea of what Mr. Humphrey is, the man whom it is proposed to have investigate, the man who is going to sit in judgment and preside at this investigation that we are going to call upon the Federal Trade Commission to make. Why, Mr. President, if we lay aside everything else, it seems to me that particularly on this question we ought not to ask an investigation by a board of which a man like that is the head.

What is it that they are going to investigate? What is the so-called trust? What is this lobby that is down here spending thousands of dollars every day to defeat just such a thing, turning heaven and earth to prevent the passage of the resolution? Is not that a sufficient reason why it should pass? That ought at least to be another reason, if it is not a sufficient reason standing by itself. Everybody knows what wonderful methods have been used by great corporations and great monopolies to control elections. Mention was made yesterday of how the Electric Trust went into the election in California when California was having a vote upon an initiative proposition to conserve the waters of California and, incidentally, in their conservation, to utilize all the electricity that could be generated. There was one of the liveliest campaigns that had ever taken place. As was shown yesterday, the rank and file of the employees and representatives of the Electric Trust in California were started out to canvass the entire State.

Cities, towns, and villages were divided into districts and every man was given his particular street, his particular block, where he had to go, in the employ of this company, and make a house-to-house canvass, to see all his acquaintances, go to his lodges and clubs everywhere where he might meet his companions, and secure their votes, if he could, against the proposition.

After that was all over, as was said yesterday, there was a committee appointed, I think, by the State Senate of California to investigate the matter. I read most of the evidence. They did not get half way through it. They ran out of money before they got very far.

It was a most remarkable condition of things. There was a man by the name of McCarthy who was a recognized and avowed leader among laboring men. They bought him. They gave him $10,000 and he was to handle and did handle, I suppose, to the extent of his ability, the laboring men. When the investigation disclosed what had happened they ran that man out of the State.

There was another man, Eustace Cullinan, who organized some kind of an organization. I have forgotten its name, but it had a very highfaluting name. The testimony showed in that investigation that he was the only man in the organization. He met in his own room, all alone, and organized and selected officers and everything. Of course, he was in the employ of the trust. That organization advertised in the newspapers of California, page advertisements of all kinds, and the people supposed that it was a real organization. It had a beautiful name. They spent $125,000 in the campaign through this one man alone, so his testimony showed, as I remember it. There never was an accounting made of a single penny.

Mr. President, that is the method that is being used, and who pays the bill? Who paid the bill in California? The men and the women who were being deceived. They were paying for their own deception. Every man or woman who read a newspaper by an electric light, every woman who washed her clothes by an electric washing machine, everyone who used electricity in any way paid his or her share of that boodle fund that contaminated California. California, however, is no exception; a proper investigation will show that the same kind of thing is going on everywhere. An investigation will also show that Mr. Insull, of Illinois, is not the only man who tries to buy and sell seats in the United States Senate. Spread all over the United States, in every community there will be some nucleus of this trust.

It is said by the utility interests, "Oh, publicity will ruin us." I think it will. I believe that a great deal of good will come from publicity. If these companies were honest, if they were not doing the things that are charged in the resolution, they would not be afraid of an investigation, but they would open their arms and say, "We are ready to be investigated." Instead of that, however, they spent enormous sums of money even to prevent this resolution from going through the Senate in its present shape. We saw two ex-United States Senators appearing before the committee. If they have their way, they are going to send the investigation to a commission that is presided over by another "lame duck," who, in language that I have read, condemns the Senate for doing business in a loose way, who tried his best to get into the Senate, but the people of his State declined to permit him to do so, and he was defeated.

Now, the question arises, What are we going to do about it? We can not at this time tell just what the magnitude of this question is. Those who have studied it and thought about it have begun to realize that it is the greatest question of the day, and that eventually, if the present stride is kept up, the electric monopoly will control everything in this country from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf. They are buying up now by the hundreds little plants away out in the country, and frequently paying three times what they are worth. The people are going to pay the bill in the end. It is the one great monopoly that uses unlimited funds, filched from the people themselves, to deceive and undo the very people who contribute in pennies the money that makes these corporations rich. That is the kind of thing we are dealing with here, and we can not give too much publicity to it.

Why should electric-light rates and the items that go to constitute them be secret? Why should the light that comes from the power in the rivers and the lakes, and from the bosom of the earth, in the shape of coal, be turned over to a few multimillionaires and the people be kept in ignorance of how they are being deceived with their own money and how they are being overcharged not for the luxuries but for the necessaries of life? This trust will reach into every home; it will affect every person—man, woman, and child—at least who is living a modern life in a modern home. There is no escape. Should they not know whether they are being overcharged? Should they not know whether the power and utility companies are contaminating our legislatures and our courts and our commissions and our Senate?

We had a lesson in reference to this matter in the Insull case. Have we forgotten that? There was a man knocking at our doors who admitted that over $125,000 was contributed to his campaign fund by these special interests. Now, are we afraid to let the light shine in and to let the truth be known to the American people? After all, they are the folk who bear the burden; they are the ones who pay the bill, and it is their property that flows down the mountain side in the shape of rivers, that is dug out of the earth in the shape of coal, that is being used to make this unseen current, this unseen comfort of modern existence and modern civilization that enters into every home. Why should we hesitate to let the owners of the property, who have to pay all the bills, know what the truth is?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I wish to state in the beginning that what I shall say is not intended as a criticism of Senators who may differ with me on this question.

For two reasons I very much regret to oppose this amendment referring the investigation to the Federal Trade Commission. First, it is offered by my friend and colleague, Senator GEORGE; and second, because of the fact that I was one of the five men appointed by President Wilson to serve on the Federal Trade Commission when it was first organized, and I was serving as chairman of the commission when I resigned to become a candidate for the Senate.

I am proud to have served with such able and splendid men as Joseph E. Davies, of Wisconsin; Edward N. Hurley, of Illinois; George Rublee, of New Hampshire; William Parry, of Washington; Governor Fort, of New Jersey; and William B. Colver, of Minnesota. The last three are no longer living. The more intimate my association was with them and with our general counsel, John Walsh, the more I recognize not only their ability but their unselfish devotion to public service.

The Federal Trade Commission was created by Congress despite bitter opposition. After the commission was created this opposition made every effort to cripple it by denying it appropriations, and some Senators to this good day are not reconciled. I recall that on two occasions the Senate Appropriations Committee declined to recommend the appropriation necessary for the expenses of the commission. I find to-day that the original supporters of the commission have not the same faith in it that they formerly had. On the other hand, the commission seems recently to have conducted its business in a way to please those who originally opposed it so bitterly. Except for this change in the policy of the commission, I would support the amendment of my colleague, Senator GEORGE, to refer the investigation to the commission.

Mr. President, Senators whose opposition was formerly so bitter are now voting unanimously to send the Walsh resolution to the commission.

I think the first few years of its existence the Federal Trade Commission served the purpose which those who created it hoped that it would, but a change of personnel reversed completely the policy of the commission and disappointed its friends to such an extent that they even thought of abolishing it.

Mr. President, I think the Power Trust is unnecessarily alarmed about the investigation that the resolution proposes shall be conducted by a Senate committee. What has it to fear from a fair investigation if it has conducted its business legitimately? I should think an investigation that would give the public the facts would be welcomed by these companies. Because Senator WALSH, by his investigation of the Teapot Dome matter was so relentless in his efforts to find the criminals in this the greatest Government scandal in many years, the Power Trust seems to be afraid this investigation, under his resolution will be a prosecution. Those of us who are associated with Senator WALSH know there is no fairer-minded or abler man in this body, and that he would not use his position to antagonize any legitimate business. Senator WALSH and those of us supporting his resolution are interested in getting all the facts to the public—the public on whom the power companies must depend to earn dividends for their companies.

The Walsh resolution originally provided for the naming of this committee by the Vice President, who is one of the leading bankers and business men of America and the world. The Power Trust even opposed this. No legitimate business should have any fear of a committee named by him. The resolution has been changed to leave the election of the committee to the Senate.

The public is deeply interested, because it is forced to pay for the electricity generated by the power companies. It is entitled to know whether the rates are fixed so as to pay dividends on watered stock or on actual money invested in their property. They are entitled to earnings on a fair valuation of their property. Many believe the power companies charge the public in Georgia and other sections too much. If not, they should welcome an investigation that would prove the contrary. I do not believe this would hurt any legitimate business interest, and certainly the consumers of power and electricity are entitled to this information. If the water-power companies have conducted their business legitimately, which I am assuming they have, why should they oppose this investigation which will make public their true condition? On the other hand, they should welcome it, let the public know the facts, and it should help the water-power companies.

While I was a member of the Federal Trade Commission an investigation was made at my suggestion of charges against the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana and other oil companies relative to an alleged discrimination in price in different sections. It was shown that the Standard Oil Cos. in Georgia and other States were charging for gasoline about 5 cents a gallon more than the Standard Oil Co. in Indiana and adjoining States. The reason for lowering the price in that section was to destroy competition from the independent companies by selling below cost of production in the Indiana territory so as to kill off this competition and making up this loss by advancing the prices in other sections. The commission placed me in charge of this investigation. I recall that Mr. Stewart, president of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, opposed this investigation and severely criticized the commission. Some men of great wealth think their conduct is above the law. I am not surprised that this same Mr. Stewart is now declining to give the Senate committee information that would enable the Government to send criminals to the penitentiary. I am sure he would prefer an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission at this time rather than by the Senate committee. The commission's investigation of the Standard Oil Co. stopped this discrimination against Georgia and other sections where gasoline was sold about 5 cents higher. The people got a reduced price from the investigation, and it did not in any way tend to destroy the Standard Oil Cos. Neither will the Walsh investigation injure the legitimate water-power companies.

Mr. President, I think the power companies are making a mistake in opposing the Walsh resolution. I am friendly to and try to encourage the development of our section by the water-power companies. I assume that their business is conducted in a legitimate way; and if it is, they certainly have nothing to fear from an investigation. If their business is not legitimate, the people of the country are entitled to know if the prices they pay for power and electricity are in turn paying dividends on watered stock. The power companies, in my judgment, are not only making a mistake in opposing this but they have made a blunder in the lobby they have kept here for years to prevent the Muscle Shoals development as the law created it; that is, to furnish nitrates to make munitions in time of war and to furnish cheap fertilizers to the farmers in time of peace. The same water-power lobby that is here opposing the Walsh resolution and trying to refer it to the Federal Trade Commission is doing its best to keep Muscle Shoals from being developed to give the farmers cheaper fertilizers.

There can be no prosperity in my State, or in any other agricultural section, until the farmers are more prosperous, and there is nothing that would help them so much as the ability to get cheap fertilizers. We should help the farmers every way possible. The water-power companies and every other business would benefit by the farmers' prosperity. Only recently the fertilizer rates have been raised about $8 a ton over last year. The reason fertilizers were sold so cheap last year was because of information farmers furnished me, which I gave the Department of Justice and asked for an investigation. It showed that representatives of the Fertilizer Trust had held a meeting at Baltimore and raised the price over the previous year. These men after an investigation were indicted in the United States court at Baltimore, pleaded guilty to having fixed fertilizer prices, and were fined $98,000. Last year they sold fertilizer cheap, they were afraid they would be again indicted and sent to prison if they violated the law by an agreement to raise and fix prices. The investigation I requested the Department of Justice to make saved Georgia farmers alone millions of dollars.

While I differ with my colleague and other Senators on the disposition of Muscle Shoals, I mean no criticism of them. However, I do feel that the Fertilizer and Water Power Trusts, which have kept a lobby here for years to defeat this legislation, have done the farmers, themselves, and everyone in our section a great injury by delaying this legislation that would give our farmers cheaper fertilizers.

Mr. President, no Senator has taken more interest in the development of water power of his State than I have. Two years ago, because of the great importance of the rivers and harbors of my State, I gave up an important committee to go on the Commerce Committee having charge of legislation for rivers and harbors. Last year I amended the rivers and harbors bill when it was before the Commerce Committee so as to require the United States engineers to make a survey of all the Georgia rivers and tributaries to find potential water power and to study navigation and flood control. When this survey is completed any farmer or other person owning property along these rivers can ascertain from the Government survey more clearly the value of such lands for water power. Heretofore the owners of lands adjacent to the streams have sold their lands at farm-land values without any additional consideration for possible water power.

Mr. President, while I have discussed this matter largely from the standpoint of how it concerns the people of my State, I feel sure that similar conditions exist elsewhere in our country.

Mr. President, the officials and employees in charge of the Georgia Railway & Power Co., which is a part of the Water Power Trust in my State, are among our leading citizens and are my good friends. I have every reason to assist them and wish them success in the development of the power which the good Lord gave us in the many rivers and their tributaries that flow through our State. I have the kindliest feelings toward them. I would do nothing that would cripple their business or any other legitimate investments. On the other hand, Mr. President, every man, woman, and child in Georgia is taxed to pay for the power furnished by this company and is interested in this investigation, and it is my duty to protect them. The public has no powerful lobby to look after their interests, and it is my duty to protect them.

This company is buying franchises in most of our cities and towns and soon will have virtually a monopoly in my State. The rate charged by the water-power companies for electricity and allowed by the public-service commission will depend upon the amount of invested capital. An investigation under this resolution would reveal the actual money invested in these companies and would determine whether there is watered stock and help them in ascertaining a fair rate. I believe in the long run that this investigation will help the companies as well as protect the public.

On account of the advantages of the rivers in my State, we should get power much cheaper than in States not so fortunate. I want to build up our State. If we get cheap power, we will attract factories and other enterprises which will add to our prosperity. But if the people of Georgia are charged unjustly high rates by the water-power companies and are thereby to be taxed to pay dividends on watered stock, then the advantage given us by the power from our rivers will be of no avail and manufacturing plants will go to other States having cheaper water-power rates. We must encourage and help the water-power companies, but they should charge the public reasonable rates.

The electricity generated from these rivers should be used to furnish water and light to the people in every home in town and country. If cheap enough, electricity can be used in cooking and washing, even in dishwashing, to the great advantage and saving to housewives. But if power companies make the price of electricity pay dividends on watered stock instead of money invested in the companies, then people of moderate means will be denied these advantages to which they are entitled, and they will drive factories from our States to other States charging reasonable rates.

Mr. President, I am not unmindful of the great political influence that the Water Power Trust wields in my State. As I have stated, I have the kindest feelings for their officials and employees. I know that they can give me trouble in my next campaign if they wish. In the election of Frank Smith to the Senate from the State of Illinois, by the use of hundreds of thousands of dollars in a corrupt campaign, the Traction and Power Trusts in that section showed what they could do. They bought a Senatorship for this man Smith who had served their interests instead of serving the public. They defeated Senator McKinley, one of the most useful Senators I have served with—a man whose kindness made him kingly. I am proud to assert that the use of money can not buy an election in Georgia. I think that in declining to seat Frank Smith the Senate has rather discouraged the use of money for the purpose of buying elections. The Senate in excluding Smith from this body has served notice that no Senator whose seat was purchased will be allowed to serve. Money spent to buy such elections will not bring any dividends to those who make such investments.

Mr. President, from what I hear from Senators and others there has not been such propaganda and lobbying against any measure since I came to the Senate as there has been against the Walsh resolution. To defeat this resolution or to refer it to the Federal Trade Commission admittedly would be a great victory for the Water Power Trust.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. ASHURST and Mr. WATSON suggested the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] are engaged in the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] desires to speak on this subject, and also the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL]. I should like to know whether other Senators want to be heard on the question.

The reason why I ask is because several Senators are absent from the Chamber, and I agreed to notify them in time to be present to vote. If there is a possibility of getting a vote to-night I should like very much to know it, on their account. If there is no possibility of getting a vote to-night I should like to be informed, so as to notify the Senators who want to be here when the vote is taken.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Indiana that I desire to say a few words explanatory of my vote on this resolution.

Mr. WATSON. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin says that he will occupy a half hour.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Nebraska desires a half hour; and if the Senator from Maryland does not want to occupy over 15 minutes there is no reason why we could not have a vote at 5 o'clock.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am advised that the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], whom I do not see in the Chamber, desires to speak; and I was told also that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] wishes to speak. If we can let the matter drift along, I think we shall get a vote within a reasonable time.

Mr. WATSON. Very well.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I shall endeavor to curtail my remarks within some reasonable limits.

At the outset let me say that it has come to me as a great surprise that the opposition to the proposal made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] should be led by one of the distinguished Senators on the Democratic side of the aisle, especially in view of the fact that in the campaign of 1924 the Democratic candidate for President and those who were promoting his candidacy were on the other side of this question and took a position quite contrary to that of the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

I hold in my hand a campaign pamphlet entitled "How Reclamation is being Wrecked and Why," issued by the Democratic National Committee from Washington, D. C.

After reciting in some detail how reclamation had been wrecked by the former administration and by the then administration, how the water-power interests of this Nation were attempting to monopolize hydroelectric and thermoelectric power and power production, and after reciting in some detail the fight on Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam, the Democratic Party of that day, with Mr. Davis as its leader, said:

> Keep in mind that this is a test fight of national concern. It is imperative to the power combine to control regulatory commissions, eliminate competition, and suppress public development of power. It does not like the Democratic platform or statements like this from Gov. Charles W. Bryan, Democratic nominee for Vice President.

Then the pamphlet quotes Mr. Bryan.

> If the water-power sites of the country were allowed to pass into the hands of great combinations of capital, the people would pass under a yoke of servitude more galling, if possible, than any foreign landlord system.
> It—

Referring to the water-power combine—> is alarmed—

So this Democratic campaign pamphlet says—

> over the campaign of Gov. Al Smith, of New York, for public development as well as strict regulation of existing private companies, with home rule for cities and the tremendous popular support back of these ideas in the State Democratic platform.

This pamphlet says, after reciting these things and other things:

> This is the stage setting, the actors, and the gigantic issue at stake. In the electric industry are invested many billions of dollars, and a major underlying issue in this campaign is whether the people shall be further mulcted by this gigantic trust.

I appreciate that this proposed resolution has reference to the expenditure of money in order to control public opinion and public office, and that it does go in the direction of the possible investigation of campaign contributions by public-service interests. It is just as important to the users of the products of these utilities to know whether the money which they are paying in increased rates for gas, electricity, and power is going into the hands of political parties and candidates for political offices as it is for them to know whether it is going into actual service.

It is important to know why the public utilities of this Nation expended in 1927, $28,000,000 for advertising, as asserted by the Manufacturers News in the October, 1927, issue.

I have here a report of the special committee on campaign expenditures for 1924, of which I understand the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was chairman, and I find from a study of that report and that biographical textbook, Who's Who, and other public sources, that vast sums of money were contributed to the Democratic Party as well as to the Republican Party by the officers and agents of the public-service corporations. In the list of contributors there were 100 contributors representing utility interests who subscribed to the Republican campaign fund, and only 9 who subscribed to the Democratic campaign fund.

I assert that the public-utility interests of America are willing to buy city councils, State legislatures, public-utility commissions, Members of Congress, and, if necessary, to control the Government of the United States, they are willing to buy membership in the President's Cabinet.

I do not know how near to the door of any Senator the trail with respect to these matters may go. As far as I am concerned, I am quite willing that a committee of the Senate should investigate these public utilities, their financial manipulations, and the campaign contributions they have made to candidates for President, Vice President, or Members of the Senate.

I notice, as all Members of this body have observed, that the most powerful lobby in the history of this Nation has been in the city of Washington for the last several weeks. Of what does that lobby consist? These public utilities, these water-power interests, and gas interests, are bipartisan. They are both Republican and Democratic, or attempt to be both. In the State of Illinois the same interests contributed to both candidates for the United States Senate. As shown by the investigation of Teapot Dome, Harry Sinclair contributed to the campaign funds of both parties.

It is the same in their selection of a lobby. On the one hand, they have a former Member of the Senate, a conservative Republican; on the other hand, they have a former Member of the Senate who was at one time a great Bryan progressive Democrat. They do not stop there. They go to men all over the United States who have held political offices, offices of importance, members of State public-utility commissions. They have gone to my State, and there appropriated a number of the former members of our railroad commission. They have attached to their lobby former governors, candidates for governors, former United States Senators, former members of State supreme courts; they have gone down the whole gamut of officialdom to seek out men who have political power, and have in the past shown some degree of political shrewdness.

The brief filed with the Interstate Commerce Committee was signed, I understand, by some 182 lawyers and law firms. Of that number 141 were attorneys who had been heretofore important public servants of their States from United States Senator down to that of delegate to a party convention.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that one of the very strongest statements made in opposition to any investigation was the one made by Mr. Gettle, president of the Public Utilities Commission of the State of Wisconsin, appointed to that position by the Senator while he was Governor of Wisconsin?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I want to inform the distinguished Senator from Indiana that in the position now occupied by the chairman of the Wisconsin Railroad Commission during his present term of office, and at the time that he was appearing before the Interstate Commerce Committee, he was not an appointee of mine while I was governor.

Mr. WATSON. He made the statement in the hearings that he was.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator did not observe what I said. He was originally appointed by me when I was governor, but his reappointment did not come from me.

Mr. WATSON. Who did appoint him?

Mr. BLAINE. The present governor.

Mr. WATSON. When the Senator, while governor, appointed him, he was entirely satisfactory, was he?

Mr. BLAINE. He was entirely satisfactory as I viewed him at that time. I do not know whether the Senator has ever been governor of his State, but I have had some experience along that line. When a governor makes appointments he does not give a bond to guarantee that the appointees will continue to serve as they ought to serve, and as he thought they would serve when appointed. They sometimes go wrong.

I am not saying that the chairman of the Railroad Commission of Wisconsin went wrong. He is not here to defend himself. I am not condemning him in this respect. I am answering the Senator's questions, and when he is satisfied, then I want to read from the hearings exactly what Mr. Gettle, of the Wisconsin Railroad Commission, said. I think the Senator from Indiana has misquoted him, and I think in all fairness to Mr. Gettle there should be read from the report what he did say.

Mr. WATSON. I speak only from recollection, and my recollection was that he was opposed to any investigation.

Mr. BLAINE. No.

Mr. WATSON. My further recollection is that he was not in favor of an investigation by a committee of the Senate. Is there anything wrong with either the integrity or the ability of the chairman of the Public Utilities Commission of Wisconsin, or whatever you may call it?

Mr. BLAINE. Let me read what Mr. Gettle said, and then we may all have an answer to that question.

Mr. WATSON. Likewise he is the chairman of the public-utilities association of the country, is he not?

Mr. BLAINE. No; he is not chairman. I quote the following questions and answers from page 36 of the report of the proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Committee relating to the investigation of public utilities:

Senator SACKETT. Are your State commissions opposed to a Federal investigation of this matter?

Mr. GETTLE. Oh, they are not opposed to a Federal investigation of those things included in this resolution which involve interstate commerce and interstate transactions.

He says more than that. On page 41 of the same report there appears the following:

Senator WALSH of Montana. Are we to understand that you object to any inquiry as to whether any State commissions do function properly or not?

Mr. GETTLE. We object to it on the ground of jurisdiction. We think that Congress has no right or power constitutionally to investigate the functions of State commissions, and have so stated in our resolution.

Senator WALSH of Montana. And that is the only ground of objection that you have?

Mr. GETTLE. Yes, sir; that is the only ground.

Senator WALSH of Montana. Outside of that, you would not have any objection?

Mr. GETTLE. None whatever. We would welcome it.

I know why Mr. Gettle was brought to Washington before the committee by this lobby. He was brought down here to give character, if you please, to the opposition, because it has been, as every Senator knows, the reputation of Wisconsin to have had splendid utility laws. Our railroad commission, our industrial commission, and I could go over the entire list which have served the public interests of Wisconsin, are well known. Mr. Gettle, by reason of his prominence in the National Association of Public Utilities Commissioners, was dragged down here in order to give some stamp of character and reputation to the opposition to the resolution by this same lobby of one hundred and some-odd lawyers, among whom were two former distinguished Members of this body belonging to different political parties.

Who are some of these lawyers who filed the brief before the committee? Mr. William V. Hodges. Who is Hodges? He is treasurer of the Republican National Committee, and has been since 1924. He had hold of the purse strings of the Republican Party. He was the gentleman who received the contributions, and the party knew from whence some contributions might be had. It gives Mr. Hodges a peculiar and particular power in the Government of the United States, representing as he does the treasury of a large and successful political party.

A former Democratic Governor of Idaho is another. Then they have a former member of the Wisconsin Railroad Commission. I am not condemning these men. I am not imputing anything wrong to them nor to the chairman of our railroad commission. I am merely indicating that this powerful combination of public utilities has a grip on things and a way by which it may control public opinion and possibly the opinion of legislatures and the Congress.

Then comes another distinguished gentleman, Robert Hale, a cousin of United States Senator HALE from Maine. So it goes all the way through, 141 former public officials who signed their names to a brief filed by the attorneys for the public-utility interests.

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] have pointed out clearly enough that the Federal Trade Commission has no power to carry out any of the wishes of the Senate as expressed in the proposed resolution; moreover, that the commission has no funds. The rider placed upon the appropriation limits the commission to the consideration, so far as Congress is concerned, of those questions relating to violations of antitrust laws, and I will not go into that matter further at this time.

But I do want to call to the attention of the Senate this report of the Federal Trade Commission. I took sufficient interest in it to have it bound, not because I had any great regard or respect for the report, but I thought it might be well to perpetuate in some permanent form the huge trick or, I would say, imposition that the Federal Trade Commission has exercised upon Congress. This volume [indicating] contains their report. In making their investigation they did not call a single witness. They did not swear a single witness. They did not cross-examine a single witness. They made no effort whatever to bring before the Federal Trade Commission a single person who might know something about the facts or information desired by the Senate.

What did the Federal Trade Commission do? It is very plain. This is not my testimony. I take my proof from the report itself. The report was made up from sources available to any Member of the Senate. The report is made up from sources which are available to every citizen of the United States, whether he is an official or a private citizen.

The information contained in their report is written in a number of other reports filed with this body or available to the public in libraries or in the departments here in the city of Washington. There is nothing original in the report. The recitation of facts as contained in the report is taken from what sources? The Federal Trade Commission says that the recitation of these facts is taken from the Bureau of the Census, the Geological Survey, the Bureau of Internal Revenue, information published in the Electric World, the Commercial and Financial Chronicle, and other financial periodicals, Poor's Cumulative Daily Digest, and investors' manuals consisting of Moody's, Poor's and Moody's, Poor's, John Moody's, McGraw's, and the Central Station Directory. The Cumulative Daily Digest is only an accumulation and compilation of news items and financial items. Those are the sources from which the report was made up.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know that I understood the Senator correctly. Did I understand him to say that the Federal Trade Commission never swore a witness nor cross-examined a witness?

Mr. BLAINE. That is my understanding, and I am taking their statement as to the sources of their information from pages 4 and 5 of their report. I would be very glad to read it for the RECORD if it is thought necessary.

I said that the information contained in this report by the commission was available to every Member of the Senate and to every citizen of the United States in public documents and in our public libraries. I want to qualify that with this statement—except in one particular instance, and that is with respect to income-tax returns.

Those are not available to Members of Congress. They are not available to anyone except by some express order of the President. The veil of secrecy has been drawn over those income-tax returns.

But aside from that one single instance, every iota of information and recitation of facts set forth in the Federal Trade Commission's report under the Norris resolution is contained in public documents available to everyone. I say, Mr. President, that it is a gross imposition upon the Senate and upon the public even to suggest that this report is the product of the Federal Trade Commission, except that its clerks and its stenographers and a few men to whom the commission gives credit compiled this recital of facts. And they call that an investigation!

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator's statement is correct, then the report is as valuable as a report of a bank examiner would be, provided he based his report on the statements of the banks appearing in the newspapers, and no more.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes. I do not want it understood that the commission did not send out requests to operating companies, holding companies, and municipal lighting departments. They did, and some of them answered. But those same organizations would have answered any inquiry from any Member of the Senate or the public, so far as that is concerned, because they were not being cross-examined. There was no searching inquiry as to whether or not those corporations and utility officers were telling the truth. They were reporting it as a Member of the Senate would report his biography to the Clerk of the Senate. What else did they do? They conferred and corresponded with the chief executive officer of the General Electric Co. and the Electric Share & Bond Co., also the principal independent holding companies, the large individual companies, and other service organizations and other associations, all of which might have been done by a Senator in his individual capacity or in his official capacity or by any citizen of the United States.

A great deal of statistical and other data were also secured from the files and the published reports of public service commissions in nearly all of the States, all of it available to Members of the Senate, available here right in the city of Washington. I dare say, Mr. President, that one clerk in my office since March 18, 1927, has presented for my own use a far more intelligent and voluminous report upon the public utilities of the United States than has been produced by the Federal Trade Commission.

After this imposition, can it be said that the Federal Trade Commission is the proper body to make an investigation? An investigation of what? To ascertain facts and information upon which this particular Senate or succeeding Senates may base legislation for the future of this industry. What does the question amount to? Is it important? I hold in my hand a letter from the Interstate Power Co. I think that organization belongs to the so-called Byllesby interests. Attached to it is an agreement between the Interstate Power Co. and a farmer in my own State. What are the rates that that farmer has to pay for light and power?

For the first 25 kilowatt-hours used per month, 28½ cents per kilowatt-hour.

That is the contract price. That contract is filed and is under the jurisdiction of the Wisconsin Railroad Commission, having jurisdiction with respect to rates and services of public utilities. I want that to go into the RECORD.

As I view the situation, boards, commissions, and public administrative bodies, having quasi-judicial and administrative powers, reflect the attitude, political and economic, of the President of the United States. As they think, so think these organizations. When such a commission is functioning under an administration directed by those who are seeking to serve the public interest first it will be found that it functions on behalf of the public. On the other hand, when the deadening hand of politics is laid upon every commission and every department of the Government it will be found that there can be no success for the Shipping Board, no success for the Inland Waterways Commission, no success for the Interstate Commerce Commission, no success for the Federal Trade Commission.

They are paralyzed or stimulated according to the political or economic views of the person who happens to be the chief of our Nation.

Mr. President, I think this matter is important. This is no trivial affair. It is important that the Congress should have the information sought. For just a moment let us look at the background of economic evolution in America. What has happened in the past through indifferent Congresses and administrations that yielded to the tremendous forces and powers that have controlled government in the past? Our public lands have been given away and vast areas of the public domain have been granted to railroads. What is the price we are paying to-day for the mistakes of the past? The American consumer is paying an increased freight rate to meet interest earnings on lands once owned by the public but donated to railroads.

What about our forests? They are almost gone or are rapidly disappearing. To-day there is on the calendar of this body a bill to authorize appropriations running into the millions to make restitution. This and future generations will pay the price because of the devastation of our forests through the mistakes of the past. Our coal fields are all in the hands of private monopoly, and what is the price we are paying for that? It is the price not only to the consumer alone in the cost of coal—and its cost is almost prohibitive—but a price far greater than that. We are to-day paying the price of men and women and children driven by the mine owners from humble dwelling places owned by the coal operator into barracks built for them by charity that their lives may be protected during the remainder of the wintertime. We are paying the price of starvation for those children.

The other week the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], with his oratorical ability to sway and convince, described the price we are paying, on the one hand, because of the exploitation of those vast coal fields which once were the heritage and in the possession of the people of the United States; and on the other hand, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] described the price that the operators claim to be paying—the price of bankruptcy.

Are we in this generation, in this Congress at this time, to repeat the mistakes of the past? If we do, future Members of the Congress of the United States with justification may and will condemn this Congress for its laches, its failure to protect the interests of the people of America.

Mr. President, involved in the question now before us is electric power produced by water and produced by coal. There is no human being who can paint in accurate colors the possibilities for the future if we preserve this heritage in the interest of the people instead of turning it over into the hands of monopolies and trusts. The water powers of America are only partially developed. They have a potential development of 54,000,000 horsepower, only a small fraction of which is developed to-day. Combining the possibilities of that power with power produced by thermal processes, by steam or oil as fuel, and considering the inventive genius of the American citizen, I can see the time not far distant, ah, within the lifetime of many Members of this body, when the energy produced by hydroelectric and thermal electric processes will be sufficient to light every home in America, be it city or rural; to drive every stationary implement upon our farms, to turn the wheels of industry, to speed our trains across the continent.

This is the age of electricity; and, as was so truly said by Engineer Cooper, who had so much to do with the engineering project of Muscle Shoals, a nation's strength, a nation's defense, depends upon her electric power.

I think the most important question before Congress at this time is this question of the preservation and conservation of these possibilities, to conserve this last and only natural resource that the American people possess—the hydroelectric energy of our flowing streams.

Mr. President, I know that the Members of this body will appreciate the full significance of the necessity of conserving these natural resources. To conserve them, it becomes necessary to legislate upon facts and information to be gathered by Congress and not by the Federal Trade Commission.

The seat to my right is vacant. It is the seat to which Frank Smith, of Illinois, would have been entitled had he not accepted contributions from those interests that wanted to buy a seat in the Senate. Frank Smith has been punished. Mr. President, I can not reconcile a vote to unseat Frank Smith with a vote to prevent a thorough, competent, and effective investigation of the subject matter of this resolution by the Senate.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two telegrams I have received on the subject of the pending resolution.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HURON, S. DAK., February 8, 1928.

Senator PETER NORBECK,
Washington, D. C.:

We suggest the wisdom of support of amendment to Walsh resolution asking that the public-utility investigation be made by Federal Trade Commission.

Hon. PETER NORBECK,
Washington, D. C.:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, February 14, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. TILSON as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We breathe our hearts' deep love to Thee, our Father, while sweet and tender memories steal over our souls. We thank Thee for health and for all the gifts Thy love imparts. So do Thou incline our hearts to seek the altar of prayer and thanksgiving. Just now let us hear Thy voice, catch its music, behold the day, and be glad. Soften our wills that we may sympathize with one another's failures. In every way lead us to magnify Thy name in human lives and homes. O Thou who dost ever sit at the fireside of the human heart; O Thou who hast never lifted a hand to smite, but is ever aloft in holy benediction, remind us that every self-surrender of man to his own higher self is met by the self-revelation of God. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LETTER FROM ADMIRAL PHILIP ANDREWS CONCERNING COLONEL LINDBERGH

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. To ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes on an important matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, on Friday last my Democratic colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC] made reference here to certain remarks attributed in the press to Rear Admiral Philip Andrews, commandant of the Boston Navy Yard, which is located in my district. Admiral Andrews in delivering an address in Boston referred to the historic New York to Paris flight of that great American, Colonel Lindbergh, and I feel that Mr. MCCLINTIC's criticism of Admiral Andrews's remarks was the result of the latter being inaccurately reported as having stated that Colonel Lindbergh's success on his trans-Atlantic trip was but a matter of mere luck.

This morning I received from Admiral Andrews a letter upon the subject, which I would like to read into the RECORD that it may serve to correct the misunderstanding that has arisen in the matter.

The high character and splendid record of Admiral Andrews gives accepted credence to his explanation. I have known the admiral personally for some years, meeting him often in an official capacity at the navy yard situated in Charlestown, which so vitally concerns my constituency. Permit me to say that in the entire United States service I do not believe there is a more efficient, more honorable, or more liberal officer than Admiral Andrews. In my estimation he is far too broad-minded and possessed too well with the capacity to judge genuine values to belittle or minimize the magnificent and inspiring accomplishments of his fellow patriot, Colonel Lindbergh.

His great talents and remarkable energy are now being given enthusiastically to the work of raising funds for the preservation of the historic frigate, the Constitution, and it will be due in a great measure to his efforts in this matter that Old Ironsides will continue to be a patriotic inspiration to all Americans.

Admiral Andrews's letter is as follows:

DISTRICT STAFF HEADQUARTERS, FIRST NAVAL DISTRICT,
Navy Yard, Boston, February 11, 1928.

DEAR MR. DOUGLASS: I was told of a few critical remarks made in the House of Representatives by Congressman MCCLINTIC, of Oklahoma, in regard to what he saw in the papers on the talk which I gave to the Men's Club of the Park Street Church in Boston.

I suppose he must have realized that any few words in the paper on a talk which took a half an hour would not be complete enough to give much of an idea of what I really said. I don't know Mr. MCCLINTIC, and while I made some responses to the inquiries of the press associations here, what they printed was very incomplete, too, though good as far as it went. I wish you would tell Mr. MCCLINTIC that he happened this time to get a very incomplete account of what I said, and also that I am not one of those opposed to aviation, as he seems to think. Also, I am not in the least disposed to offer any criticism of Lindbergh, for whom I have a whole-hearted admiration.

I have, as you know, a son-in-law who has been a naval aviator for about six years—Lieut. C. C. Champion—who holds the altitude records for both landplanes and seaplanes. He is the remarkable person who fell 7 miles last July over the city of Washington and had the cylinder heads and pistons of his motor blow out, had four fires on the way down, and managed to put them out and land his plane without any other damage except the holes made in it by the flying missiles. I am rather proud of him and his accomplishments. I am more than proud of Lindbergh and think that he is without doubt the greatest aviator in the world. I believe, too, what nobody has ever said before, that Lindbergh is probably the one man who could repeat his performance of flying from New York to Paris. I believe he could do that successfully again.

What I was trying to point out to this very small assemblage of about 30 people—and I may say that I made a very rambling talk, without any notes or without any preparation—was that the weather was such a determining factor in the success of very long distance flights, and I was talking about the possibility of carrying freight and passengers across the Atlantic Ocean, and was stressing particularly the great influence the wind had, and I stated that I did not think a regular service across the Atlantic was possible in the present development of the airplane unless we got a new and much lighter fuel than we have at the present time.

There was nothing that I said that reflected on Lindbergh in any way, but I am sure that if Mr. MCCLINTIC himself had heard all that I said that he would have entirely agreed with it. I mentioned the fact that Lindbergh with great judgment had picked out one of the two occasions when the weather during that summer was favorable for such a flight.

You know how efficient and what a high standing our Naval Reserve aviation station at Squantum has. That is, I think, partly due to my encouraging attitude toward aviation, which everybody about here thoroughly understands.

I also told the press people that I didn't get my opinions from Secretary Wilbur or anybody else in Washington, and that I had had no talk with anybody there on the subject of aviation. If I knew Mr. MCCLINTIC, I would write him myself, but I feel sure that you can tell him that I am not an "anti" in the least. Also, I might say that Lindbergh has done more for international good will than any 40 diplomats that could be imagined, and also I have felt somewhat fearful, in his making so many trips around this country and over Central and South America, of something happening to him. And to have any accident befall him would be nothing short of a national calamity. So that's that.

With kind regards to you and your family,

Very sincerely yours,

PHILIP ANDREWS,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy.

Hon. JOHN J. DOUGLASS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

[Applause.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 7009) to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the conference report on the bill H. R. 7009. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The conference report was read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

Y., for the purpose of razing the old cadet mess hall, and of preparing the plans and specifications and of excavating the ground and otherwise preparing the site for the construction of a new cadet barracks at the United States Military Academy (the total cost of which is not to exceed $825,000), $185,000: Provided, That the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. And the Senate agree to the same.

"The act entitled 'An act to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1927, is hereby amended so as to strike out the authorization therein for $500,000 for barracks at Fort Benning, Ga., and to substitute therefor the following: 'For Fort Benning, Ga., barracks, $300,000; to complete the hospital, $135,000; to construct nurses' quarters, $65,000.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7009) to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

On No. 1: Strikes out the total carried in the bill and substitutes the total brought about by the changes agreed to by the conference committee.

On Nos. 2 and 3: The Assistant Secretary of War in charge of aviation asked that the language passed by the House be changed and the new figures be inserted because further study of the project made necessary the increased authorization.

On No. 4: This amendment was adopted at the suggestion of the Chief of the Air Corps because it was for this building the increased amount is desired.

On Nos. 5 and 6: The Assistant Secretary of War for Aeronautics stated that the amount carried in the bill as it passed the Senate was necessary for the building program at the new primary flying school in order to insure a complete project.

On No. 7: The gas holder at Scott Field, Ill., is merely the completion of a unit for the new plant being constructed at that field and as such is a necessary item. The word "hydrogen" was stricken from the bill because the gas holder is to contain helium.

On No. 8: The House passed H. R. 9567, to authorize appropriations for the construction at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and for other purposes, introduced by Hon. DANIEL R. ANTHONY, Jr., and the Senate included the item in this measure. The House also passed H. R. 9676, providing for construction at Walter Reed General Hospital, and H. R. 9202, authorizing construction at the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., and these items also are carried in this amendment. The item for Fort Benjamin Harrison was reduced because there are only 440 men at this post, who are now housed in temporary quarters. A personal visit by the chairman of the subcommittee of the House Committee on Military Affairs in charge of real estate and construction developed the fact that the most necessary construction at that post at this time was a motion-picture theater, because the present room for such purposes is on the second floor of a frame structure that is a veritable fire trap.

On No. 9: A letter from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Senate Military Committee explained the necessity for this legislation. The amendment is to indicate definitely that "Ward Building" is part of the hospital at Fort Sill, Okla.

On No. 10: The change in language in this amendment was made to conform to the suggested language of the Secretary of War in a letter on the subject.

JOHN M. MORIN,
W. FRANK JAMES,
JOHN J. MCSWAIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Nebraska rise?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Would the Speaker please submit my request to the House for permission to speak for about 15 minutes on the subject of a big Navy?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman do that to-morrow. Let us divide the time up.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. That would suit me, to-morrow morning.

Mr. MADDEN. I suggest that the gentleman may get in some time during the day in the committee, out of order. I do not want him to be out of order now.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. If I do that, Mr. Speaker, I will have to violate my program. My program does not permit me to ask any individual for time, but the whole House.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not have to ask any individual Member. I know the gentleman will be circumspect. Sometimes, as he knows, we try to get in in any way we can.

Mr. MCCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes to-morrow immediately after the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] concludes his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes to-morrow immediately after the gentleman from Michigan concludes his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to a proposed change of reference of the bill (S. 1287) for the relief of Near East Relief (Inc.). This bill was messaged over from the Senate on February 8. It was inadvertently referred to the Committee on War Claims. It is agreed by the chairman of the Committee on Claims and the chairman of the Committee on War Claims that it should be referred to the Committee on Claims. Without objection, it will be so referred.

There was no objection.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10635) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10635, with Mr. MICHENER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10635, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10635) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, last week the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] asked unanimous consent to proceed for 30 minutes. I objected and said we would give the gentleman time in general debate. It so happened that when he could be given time he had to go away and notified me he could not be here. I suggested I would ask that he be given time this morning, so I ask unanimous consent, notwithstanding the fact that we have begun to read the bill, that the gentleman from South Dakota may speak out of order for 30 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that, but I had agreed to yield some time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] yesterday, but I did not do it. I do not think the gentleman wants over 5 or 10 minutes, and then I understand that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] desires to speak out of order for five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I will include the three gentlemen in my request. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], and that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], in the order named, may proceed out of order for 5 minutes, 30 minutes, and 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this morning's newspaper reports announce the successful return of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh from his goodwill South and Central American flight to his home at St. Louis. The Spirit of St. Louis has now returned to the bosom of its mother. In making this flight Colonel Lindbergh has rendered his country a great service. At a time when within those regions there has existed so much to arouse their hostility toward the United States and at a time when European nations, perhaps, are endeavoring to alienate Central and South America for trade purposes, this great evangel of peace and of good will, this daring messenger of his country, has gone to those regions and brought the people of those climes to his feet in tribute and won for himself, as a representative of the great Republic of the north the highest respect and the finest enconiums of this day.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as an humble representative of the American people, let me here express the hope that Colonel Lindbergh may cease to imperil his valuable life and endanger his personal safety by other hazardous or dangerous flights.

I believe the Congress of the United States ought to pass a resolution memorializing Colonel Lindbergh not again to risk the hazards of the air or the perils of the sea, but to devote his life to leadership in America in the development of aircraft [applause] and in continuing to stir within the young manhood of America that compelling inspiration which his great example has already generated.

Gentlemen of the committee, his example is too valuable, his life is too precious, his inspiration to the young manhood of America is too splendid, and his services to his country in developing aircraft and the Nation's fighting force in the air are too far beyond computation to risk them again in dangerous enterprises. The path of duty lies now in the direction of preserving his great life. The world is already at his feet in tribute to his daring achievements of the past. Let Congress request him now to preserve his life for the service of his country and of the world in the years of the future. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I doubt whether I will be able to conclude my remarks in the time allotted to me, so I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the course of a life that has not been entirely free from activities it has been my good fortune and privilege to know many men who have taken a rather prominent part in the affairs of the Nation. I have known many legislators in this body in this time, men who know how laws are drafted, how laws are passed, and how laws have been defeated. I have known many men who have been eminent in the law and in medicine and who know what part lawyers and physicians are supposed to take in the scheme of life. It has been my good fortune to know many men who have taken part in other activities of the country, famous baseball players and football players, and men who have served with credit to themselves and their country in some of the greatest battles of history. I have heard those men discuss the rules of the games in which they have taken part. I have heard Members of Congress object, and I thought rightfully object, because something had been done in the process of legislation that was unfair. I have heard football players object, for instance, because some one had violated the rules and tackled below the knees or tried to gouge out some one's eyes. I have heard baseball players complain because some one attempting to play the game had deliberately slid into second base or home plate and tried to spike them. I have heard many soldiers make objections because they did not think they should always be shot in the back without any possibility of protecting themselves. The rules affecting all the activities to which I have referred are well recognized and should be observed.

But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I thought most of those rules were violated on the 17th of January, when Senate Resolution 52, the McMaster resolution, referring to the tariff, all at once appeared on the floor of this House. It was impossible for me to be present that day because I had a rather important engagement—at least to me—in a hospital in the city of Washington, and therefore never had an opportunity to express myself on either the subject matter or the procedure.

This resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That many of the rates in existing tariff schedules are excessive, and that the Senate favors an immediate revision downward of such excessive rates, establishing a closer parity between agriculture and industry, believing it will result to the general benefit of all.

Resolved further, That such tariff revision should be considered and enacted during the present session of Congress.

And then, apparently as an afterthought, and innocently or otherwise, it was—

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

Now, while it was impossible for me to be present, I did what every Member of this body or any other parliamentary body would do. I had a general pair, asking the pair clerk in the event anything was thrown into the House and I could not be present, to pair me with the majority of the Republicans, believing, as I do, that the expression of a majority of the Republicans would be more likely to result in good for the entire Nation than any other group of men who form any political party, and I was therefore, apparently, paired against the McMaster resolution.

It is a fundamental right of either branch of Congress, the House or the Senate, to resolve on any subject at any time. If either branch of Congress should determine that it was the guardian of the entire world and all the people contained therein, it would be particularly appropriate that that body should pass a resolution on every conceivable subject. In the particular resolution referred to, the Senate recorded itself as believing that the resolution would result to the general benefit of all, and if that statement is true, the Senate should certainly have resolved at great length. So long as the resolution remained in the confines of the Senate and afforded only a wonderful opportunity for the display of oratorical ability, it acted as a vehicle to convey to the world at large, and industry in particular, that there was a real need and demand for the passage of farm-relief legislation. Presumably, the Senate had in mind the thought that if agricultural legislation was not enacted into law those who believed in such legislation were ready to lower the tariff on commodities of manufacture and industry so that there would be equality among men whether they manufactured goods or produced agricultural products, and though it is very far from my present intention to attempt to discuss the senatorial mind or intention in this discussion, from reading the debates on the McMaster resolution, it is entirely probable that the Senate intended to convey that thought by the passage of the resolution, and as long as it remained on the Senate side it would have accomplished that purpose. I think, perhaps, this was the intention in the mind of that great parliamentary body, because I have read with great interest recent speeches made by a very distinguished and able Senator from my State, Senator PETER NORBECK. On June 15, 1926, as shown by the RECORD, he expressed the thought which I know he believes in and which I know I believe in when he said:

The wise business man is already beginning to realize that his market is adversely affected by the farm depression. The farmers may be in the minority, but an active minority is often an effective force. You ask what will happen. Several things will happen. First, the farmer will tear down the tariff structure, for he believes that he will be invited to participate in its rebuilding. He will not be ignored when that task comes. Perhaps he may, like Samson of old, pull down the temple upon himself, but desperate people will do desperate things, and there is no way to stop them. Radicalism that has been expressed in recent primary elections will be mild compared to what will follow if the present inequality continues.

And then, still consistent and still able to express himself, on January 16 of this year the distinguished and able senior Senator from South Dakota, in his remarks, said:

The point is that the Northwest must look out for itself, and it will look out for itself. The farmers of the prairies are no longer party bound. They do not vote for labels alone. They now look carefully to principles of parties and to the character and record of the candidates. They are not unmindful of the fact that it was following eight years of Democratic administration that the Republican stock dividends, referred to by my colleague [Mr. MCMASTER] the other day, were paid. They were not 10, 20, and 30 per cent; they ran to hundreds of per cent and thousands of per cent, and in one case a 16,000 per cent stock dividend was paid.

PARTY RESPONSIBILITY

The farmer well understands that his ruination came during a Democratic administration and was due to the attitude of the party toward him. He has watched closely the record of both sides of this Chamber on so-called farm-relief measures, and he finds that only one record is worse than that of the Republican Party in the Senate, and that is that of the Democratic Party. But the farmer also knows that the Republican Party promised in its platform to remedy the inequality existing. The failure to do so is the record that stands against the party. The attitude of the parties and candidates will be closely watched in the coming presidential campaign.

The Senators from the agricultural South and the industrial East have joined hands against making the tariff effective for the farmer by the McNary-Haugen bill, and they are not supporting any other measure that will accomplish the purpose. The Northwest farmer is still pleading for economic justice for agriculture—a proportionate price for the products of his labor. If this is denied him, he will insist on tearing down the tariff wall. If the farmer is compelled to sell in a world market, he will demand the privilege of buying all his supplies in the same market free from import duty.

The tariff must be made effective for the farmer also or the tariff must be reduced.

I have quoted the Senator so extensively because he has so well expressed the thought in which I believe.

There would have been no trouble and no debate on this side of the House except, innocently or otherwise, the last proviso of this resolution directed that a copy of it be transmitted to the House of Representatives. This, in spite of the fact that section 7 of Article I of the Constitution provides as follows:

All bills for raising revenue shall originate within the House of Representatives.

And every time the parliamentary body at the other end of the Capitol has attempted to violate this provision of the Constitution there have been plenty of Members on this side who believe in the Constitution who have been ready and willing to make the objection to its action.

The provision in the Constitution means exactly what it says; and the Senate has no more power or authority to originate tariff legislation than the House has the right to dictate to the Senate concerning treaties with foreign governments, and we do not attempt to do this. The Senate does not even possess the right or power to add a tariff law as a rider on an appropriation bill. It has no power whatsoever in originating revenue matters, and I presume it never will have such power. So far as I have been able to determine in the past resolving career of that distinguished body, it has tried to keep within its jurisdiction and never before has submitted such a resolution.

The rules of the House must be lived up to and respected exactly as the rules of the Senate or the rules of the courts, and the House could do very little under this resolution that suddenly appeared from the other side of the Capitol, because it did not anticipate that that body would attempt to violate the Constitution of the United States; and our rules made no provision for the other parliamentary body attempting to violate the Constitution; and the House, as the judge of the matter, hardly knew what to do when this foundling baby was laid on its doorstep. Its paternity was known but its legitimacy questioned, and we did not know what to do with it. The Democratic leader, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, who knows parliamentary law and whose mental integrity has never been questioned by anyone, moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Now, had it been so referred, not being a proposed law, and not being a joint or a concurrent resolution, and, in fact, not being much of anything but an expression of opinion, it could only have been debated for an hour and then have quietly died. The Speaker very properly ruled that such reference of the resolution was not in order. Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, the Democratic leader, in his great desire to promote peace and harmony among the Republicans, made it difficult for the average citizen and voter to distinguish between Democrats who run on the Republican ticket, Republicans who believe in a tariff based on the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad and Democrats who believe in a tariff for revenue only, and moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. This would have been a polite and dignified way of administering the death blow to the resolution as it would then have never seen the light of day.

It might have been discussed in executive session of the committee, but the rules of the House would have prohibited that discussion from having been made public. If it were to have been discussed, far better that it remain on the Speaker's table, for anyone feeling the urge to indulge in oratorical effulgence who could secure a few moments to speak might discuss it.

It is clear, however, under the Constitution and the rules that the Senate had no right to initiate revenue legislation, and Mr. TILSON, of Connecticut, made the point of order that the motion to refer the motion to the Ways and Means Committee was not in order. The Chair very properly sustained the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee then appealed from the decision of the Chair. Mr. TILSON, of Connecticut, then moved to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair. The roll call was then taken upon the motion to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair. It was not a vote on the McMaster resolution, and the practical result of the vote only is to make it possible for every political demagogue and candidate for Congress who desires to misrepresent the facts to assert anything that he wishes to assert concerning the vote of any Member of Congress and apparently prove his case. No Member of Congress could express himself, because the motion was not debatable.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would like to yield, but I will say that the combination between the Senate and the Democrats of the House has made plenty of trouble already. I will yield a little later.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The same thing will apply to the gentleman from Tennessee, for whom I have great respect. I do not want his speech embedded in mine.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman spoke about being in trouble, and I thought I would help him out. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. No; I am not in trouble; I am trying to get other gentlemen out of trouble, which they do not deserve. Now, this can easily be shown by the votes of Members of Congress from my own State, two able and distinguished gentlemen, Mr. WILLIAMSON and Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON, representing two districts from that State, with whom it has been my pleasure to serve during all of their legislative career. Neither of them has disagreed on agriculture or tariff legislation. Both have supported loyally and faithfully the McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization fee.

In that I agree with them and still agree with them. Both have stood upon the doctrine that if adequate agricultural legislation can not be enacted to place upon a parity agriculture, industry, and labor, the tariff wall must be lowered, at least to the basis of the difference in cost of production at home and abroad.

They both came here in their congressional innocence and they have been valuable Members. I know they agree absolutely with Senator NORBECK and myself and others, and yet you have seen one recorded one way and one the other, when, as a matter of fact, they agree with me that we will have agricultural relief, or Congress may not adjourn, or we may have a revision of the tariff.

So far as I know no one has ever questioned this attitude of any of the Members of the House from South Dakota. If they should question, it would be political trickery and untrue. On the motion to lay the appeal on the table, one of these gentlemen voted aye and the other no. Either of those votes accomplished the same thing, to wit, nothing. If the appeal were lost the resolution would be smothered in the Ways and Means Committee, and if the appeal was successful the resolution would be smothered on the Speaker's table.

The final result of the vote was only to embarrass every Republican Member of Congress from an agricultural district and to open the door so that every demagogue who desired to get to Congress could attack every Member for voting either way, and every political pirate is doing that very thing.

No one in the House can express themselves on any particular subject, but any one in the other body can express themselves on anything at any time. The rule that applies in the House and in the Senate therefore is different. You know that on this side of the Capitol our business is to legislate rather than to indulge in oratory.

We believe that we would rather pull agriculture up to the plane of manufacture and industry than to depress industry and manufacture down to the plane of agriculture. I think that a great President, Theodore Roosevelt, expressed a thought that should never be forgotten, when in one of his speeches he said that in the long run everyone in the United States will go up or down together, and I prefer to see every branch of business in the United States and agriculture come to a higher plane or standard of living than to depress the business of anyone. [Applause.]

Of course, as I say, I do not know what was in the mind of the men who sent this resolution over here. I asked a distinguished Member of the other body, whom I know very well, and whom I had the great privilege of knowing some years ago when he was serving in the Army. I can talk with him and he can talk with me very frankly. A few days ago I said to him, "Just why did you put that third provision in the resolution, to send a copy of it over to the House, when you knew that we could not get a vote on it, when you knew that all that we could do would be to have four or five parliamentary votes on the question and that no one could express himself, with the result that a few political pirates and demagogues could tear around the United States and misrepresent our position?" He answered me very frankly, as he has always dealt with me during the years I have known him, both in the Army and in the Congress. He said, "I do not know what was in their minds, but they might have been a good deal like the doughboy who had recently enlisted and was sent up as a replacement to the Infantry in the Rainbow Division in the late war. Thrown in, as this doughboy was, with a lot of old, hardened, battle-scarred veterans, he did not feel that he should show his ignorance of the implements of war and destruction which are used in time of battle.

"Particularly did he fail to have an explanation made to him of the dangers and possibilities and idiosyncrasies of hand grenades, and no one thought to tell him that if the pin on one of those grenades was pulled, within five seconds it would blow up not only all of the innocent bystanders who happened to be in the vicinity but was likely to blow up the pullee of the pin. Some one had told him, however, that these grenades were noisy, and were loaded with T. N. T.; but he did not think of that until after he had pulled the pin, when suddenly it occurred to him that the pin had some connection with the firing mechanism, and two seconds before the grenade exploded he managed to give it a wild heave in the general direction of the sky, just like resolutions sometimes come to parliamentary bodies. After the dead and wounded had been cleared away, a hard-boiled old captain from the company, who rode down in the ambulance with the recruit, as they took him to the hospital for repairs and replacement, said, 'Son, what did you want to do; kill all the men in your own company?' 'Captain,' said the boy, 'I didn't know anything about these hand grenades. The corporal said that they would make an awful lot of noise, but really I did not know that such a little piece of machinery could raise so much hell.'" [Laughter.]

That is exactly the situation of this resolution. No one appreciated the fact that coming in as it did it might tend to give every political demagogue in the United States an opportunity to run for Congress; that it might give men a chance to misrepresent other men, and that it could serve no useful purpose, whether it laid on the Speaker's table and died there, or reposed on the desk of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and died there, because, no matter what happened to it, it had to die under the Constitution of the United States and the rules of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that I have expressed myself clearly enough so that there will be less of misrepresentation of the votes of Members of Congress. I have two very good friends whom I see before me to-day, and one of them voted "nay" and the other voted "aye" on the resolution. Both are for agricultural relief and take the viewpoint that I take, that if we do not get it we are very likely to see some tariff legislation before this is over, and if I have in any degree protected those men from unfair abuse, I shall have served the only purpose I desired to serve in this short discussion. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARNER of Texas. And I shall ask the gentleman one question appropriate to the present moment. The gentleman says that his only purpose in rising this morning was to protect his two colleagues from his State. I now ask him on which side he would have voted had he been here?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Had I been here I would have lived up exactly to the Constitution of the United States and the rules of the House, and have voted to sustain the position of the Chair, which I think was correct.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. And the gentleman does not favor the sentiments expressed in the McMaster resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman from Texas perhaps has not listened to me very carefully.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Oh, yes; I did listen very carefully to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I said that I favored agricultural relief and the McNary-Haugen bill; to be exact, that we ought not to divide our forces on that; and if we can not pass the McNary-Haugen bill and industry and agriculture do not get on a parity, then I am willing to join anyone to revise the tariff; but I should like to have the battle on the McNary-Haugen bill instead of on a resolution that means nothing.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. But if the gentleman can not raise agriculture up to where we desire to raise it, he would be willing to reduce the tariff on some of the things that the farmer has to purchase?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who wished me to yield to him some time ago.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, the gentleman has answered the question that I would have asked him.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that for four or five years I have been hearing statements made to the effect that if we did not pass farm-relief legislation along certain lines we were going to revise the tariff. This is the only time during those five years in which those gentlemen making those threats, including the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] and others, have had a chance to make good their threats. Does not the gentleman think it would have been a good step to have taken to have shown that they mean business by adopting that resolution? I suggest that action along that line would have at least indicated the sentiment of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman seems to think that the Constitution of the United States and the rules of the House should be violated in voting to override the ruling of the Chair concerning a resolution violating the rules?

Mr. JONES. No. The gentleman has not stated how he really feels on the resolution. On the merits of that resolution is he in favor of tariff reduction or not?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have expressed my views exactly on the tariff and industrial-relief questions, and on the resolution that came up here on a technical and partisan vote.

Mr. JONES. Does not the gentleman think that if the House expressed its opinion, it might have some persuasive force with the committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I suggest that if the gentleman will get his Democratic Members together and agree upon a system of farm relief, we may be able to do something. But he can not get more than two-thirds of them. If the gentleman will get his people together and give us a bill based on the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, he will have a chance to do something.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman vote in favor of that?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman from Texas can get plenty of votes when they are purely political, but he can not get them when they are practical.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman vote for a revision of the tariff law now?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would be willing to vote on a law, but not on a fool resolution.

Now, if the gentleman will keep quiet for a moment, I will tell him how to do it.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman and his colleagues have been talking for five years about what they wanted to do, and yet when they get a chance to do it they do not take advantage of it. They vote against the only opportunity they have had in all these years for a real expression on the tariff. That is not a fool resolution, but one of tremendous importance.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman give us an idea of what the farmer expects to buy cheaper when he gets a reduction of the tariff—things that he buys now? Everything that he buys now—fertilizer, twine, and machinery are admitted under the free list.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Oh, if I should start in on the tariff duties on different schedules I would not have time enough between now and next Christmas. I would like to go into those questions, but if the gentleman will read the Senate debate on this Senate resolution he will find there the very answer that he wishes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me now?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will be delighted to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In the event farm-relief legislation, or to be specific, the McNary-Haugen bill, should fail, will he be ready to consider the question of a tariff debate?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Dakota if he is not absolutely confident in his own mind that there is not the remotest chance for an agricultural relief bill, containing the equalization fee, to become a law at this time?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do think it has a good chance, I will say to the gentleman. Conditions have changed since it was up before, and ideas have been changed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think there has been a change in the White House?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I know there is a change. I am not authorized to speak for the gentleman in the White House, but I think there are enough votes in the House to override a veto, even if the gentleman in the White House does not agree to it. If Congress should not adjourn this summer, there might be time for the discussion of many things.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. If the conditions were reversed, and the gentleman from Tennessee were Speaker and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] were the minority leader, and the gentleman from Tennessee were in the chair, when this tariff resolution came up would he not have ruled exactly as the Speaker did rule?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I decline to give the Republican side of the House the benefit of my wisdom. They will have to solve their own problems. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I thought the gentleman would refuse. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] is recognized for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to speak about that hand grenade which so affected my friend from South Dakota, but I do wish to call to the attention of the House and have it read in my time a resolution passed at a recent meeting of the executive committee of the American Legion, Department of North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the resolution.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution

Be it resolved by the executive committee of the North Carolina Department, American Legion, that—

Whereas at every annual convention of this department the members of the department have unanimously adopted resolutions memorializing the Senators and Representatives of this State to support the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill for relief of the disabled temporary officers of the World War; and

Whereas at the present session of Congress this bill has again been reported favorably to both branches of Congress and will undoubtedly pass by a large majority if it is brought to a vote: Now, therefore,

This committee unanimously requests the Members of Congress from North Carolina to support the efforts of those in charge of this bill for an early and favorable vote thereon.

For four sessions, Mr. Chairman, this bill has been reported favorably by the committee of the House. For four times the House has failed to take action upon it. I think on several occasions this bill, or a bill of similar character, passed the Senate, but for seven years there has been no attempt by the majority party in this House to bring this bill to a vote. Members of the House have constantly said, a majority of them, in fact, that they are in favor of this bill.

The reason that I am bringing it to your attention to-day is that it is time for us either to vote it up or vote it down, and quit playing with it. If there is merit to it, as I think there is, then there is no question but what we as men should face it and should vote on it. For eight years we have played football with this.

While I am speaking about that, may I not say also as to other veterans' legislation that there has not been a single meeting of the full Committee on Veterans' Legislation. That will run along, like it always does, to the end of the session, and then it will be brought in under suspension of the rules. It is true, in justice to the chairman, that he has been in the hospital, but he has been out for some time. Nearly two months and a half have elapsed. There have been subcommittee meetings on the hospital bill, but nothing definite has been done with respect to that. The subcommittee has never reported to the full committee. There have been a few meetings of the subcommittee in regard to the insurance matter, but no report to the full committee. You can mark my prediction, which will come true, that there will not be a meeting of the full committee before the latter part of this month or of next month. It is meant and intended by the majority steering committee on your side of the House that the general bill for veterans' relief shall be brought up toward the end of the session under suspension of the rules, as all similar bills have been in the past.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. As I understand, the bill to which the gentleman refers is the one which equalizes the pay.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is the emergency officers' bill.

Mr. CLARKE. That is the bill to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. What is the objection to it?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I can not find any objection to it, and I have voted on it favorably in the committee time after time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to speak on the subject of the division in the Republican ranks on the McMaster resolution?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to speak on the matter discussed by the gentleman who preceded me, Mr. BULWINKLE.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have listened with much interest to what my good friend Mr. BULWINKLE has had to say about veterans' legislation and in particular about the bill known as the emergency officers' bill. He and I have not parted company generally on veterans' legislation, but we have parted company on that bill. We have fought side by side for all veterans' legislation since I have been here.

I am one of a group of service men in the House who appeared before the Rules Committee in the last Congress opposing the giving of a rule on the emergency officers' bill. Our reasons for doing it were plainly stated to the Rules Committee then; they are printed and nobody need have any doubt about what those reasons are. I likewise spoke before the House last Congress on the bill. I propose to appear before the Rules Committee again this year, if given the opportunity, before a rule is granted on the emergency officers' bill.

In all of these years we have not had before the Veterans' Committee of this House an open full hearing on that bill, and I will say this to the Rules Committee now, as I say it to the House, that if the Veterans' Committee will hold hearings on the emergency officers' bill and give the men on that committee who are opposed to it a fair chance to call witnesses and examine them, and to bring before the Veterans' Committee the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, the national commander of the American Legion, the national commander of the Disabled American Veterans and others who are asking for this legislation in order that the Congress may know first hand what the opinion is regarding the bill and what the facts are, and what the bill does, then I will not oppose the bill coming on the floor of the House for consideration.

Until that is done I feel we are entitled to oppose the bill coming before the House. It is a bill that now proposes to fix permanently an annual charge of something better than $2,000,000 a year and upward on the Treasury. It is a bill that discriminates decidedly against over 200,000 disabled enlisted men of the World War and against over 6,000 disabled officers. I think we ought to have the facts; Congress is entitled to the facts. All the facts we have now before the Congress are facts that men who have studied that bill and who have reached the conclusion it is wrong have pulled out of different people at different times—thus some prepared statements submitted to the committee by interested organizations. The World War Veterans' Committee has not brought those facts to the Congress and they should. We are entitled to have that committee bring those facts and those witnesses to us.

There is pending now before the House on that bill a minority report from the World War Veterans' Committee signed by two service men of the World War, one a Republican and one a Democrat, who are opposed to the bill. Last year there were four service men on that committee who signed that report. Two of them are not now members of the committee. With the permission granted to extend my remarks I include herein a copy of their report:

MINORITY VIEWS

Having been denied hearings in the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, we content ourselves with the presentation of the minority views as expressed in connection with this bill in the Sixty-ninth Congress and which are submitted below.

J. E. RANKIN.
BIRD J. VINCENT.

This is known as the World War emergency officers' retirement bill. If it should become a law it would most unjustly discriminate against all disabled enlisted men and a large part of the disabled emergency officers in favor of a certain class comprising a limited number of disabled emergency officers. It would reward men not according to their disability but according to their rank, thereby violating the very fundamental principles of our American institutions.

For instance, an officer who incurred physical disability in line of duty and has been "or may hereafter be" rated at not less than 30 per cent permanent disability shall be placed upon the retired list at 75 per cent of the salary to which he was entitled at the time of his discharge. What does this mean? It means that an emergency officer with a 30 per cent disability which originated in line of duty shall receive pay for life as follows:

	Per month
Brigadier general	$375.00
Colonel	250.00
Lieutenant colonel	218.75
Major	187.50
Captain	150.00
First lieutenant	125.00
Second lieutenant	93.75

While the enlisted man with a 30 per cent disability will receive $30 a month.

Yet they tell us that the ex-service men are in favor of this measure. That is not true. If every ex-service man in the United States understood what this bill means, we doubt if it would receive the indorsement of 1 service man out of 10.

It even discriminates against an overwhelming majority of the disabled emergency officers themselves. Those who are rated at less than 30 per cent permanent disability are excluded from a participation in the financial benefits of this measure. They are to receive the same pay as enlisted men with similar disabilities. If a colonel and his enlisted brother were both 30 per cent permanently disabled, the colonel would receive $250 a month, while the enlisted man would receive only $30 a month. But if they were both 29 per cent permanently disabled they would both receive the same compensation, $29 a month.

Not only that, but it discriminates against the sacred dead, who "gave the last full measure of devotion" upon the field of battle or have died since the war closed. Their loved ones who were dependent upon them for support would not receive one dollar's worth of benefit from this unjust legislation. The widows and children of officers who gave their lives in the conflict, or who have died since the war closed, would draw compensation on the basis of allowances for the dependents of enlisted men.

The disabled emergency officers are being taken care of now along with the enlisted men. They served together, they fought together, they were frequently members of the same families, and where they suffered the same disabilities they should receive the same treatment.

But the advocates of this bill argue that these disabled emergency officers are discriminated against in the retirement of officers of the Regular Army, and ask Congress to pass this measure to favor 1,848 of these emergency officers and to discriminate against 41,496 enlisted men who are disabled to the same degree and 6,618 disabled emergency officers and 171,580 disabled enlisted men whose disabilities are rated at less than 30 per cent, in order to correct what they contend is a discrimination in favor of the officers of the Regular Army.

We are not responsible for the present law providing for the retirement of officers of the Regular Establishment. But if we were, and were willing to concede that there is an injustice in the present law, we would not be justified in trying to offset it by passing additional unjust legislation.

We must remember that officers of the Regular Establishment go into the Army for life. They make it their life's work; and in order to secure the class of men necessary to maintain the proper officer personnel in times of peace we must make some provision for taking care of them in case they become disabled.

As was said by a former Secretary of War:

"The privileges of the retired list of the Regular Army constitute a consideration granted by the Government for the consecration of lives to its military service and the volunteering for life for such service in any exigencies that may arise, whether in peace or war. The military relation requires the officer to give up ambitions which are the rightful portion of every man in the great world outside, and for a measure of compensation which does not exceed what is barely sufficient to maintain himself and family in the status which the military service demands; and the law has said that when he serves a prescribed period of time, or has reached a certain age, or is disabled by injury or disease incident to the service, he must withdraw from active service and give way to a younger man better fitted for the rigors of military life. As the officer has not been trained for a business career or for any career in civil life, he finds himself at the end of his service, certainly in the vast majority of cases, not only without a profession but without a competency."

He also calls attention to the fact that—

"Congress has thus far restricted the privilege of retirement to members of the permanent Military Establishment; that is, to those only who have consecrated their lives to the military service. This is true not alone of the officers but of the enlisted man, who may retire only when he has served a sufficient time to indicate that he has adopted the military service as a life career. To those who have thus pledged their services for life to the Nation, in peace or in war, Congress, as a matter of keeping faith with them, has provided by law that they shall be secure in their calling throughout their lives, and when they have performed what is deemed a life service shall be relieved of some of the active duties of service and be permitted a living pay for the remainder of their lives. This basic principle of our retirement laws is recognized in an opinion rendered June 10, 1898, by Solicitor General Richards and had the approval of Attorney General Griggs. In discussing the applicability of laws relating to the Regular Army to the then existing volunteer forces the Solicitor General said:

"Chapter 2 of Title XIV, providing for the retirement of Army officers, clearly has no application to the Volunteer Army, organized for simply temporary service. This chapter creates two lists of Regular Army officers—the active and the retired list—a distinction which does not obtain in the Volunteer Army. When, therefore, section 1222 places a restriction on every 'Army officer on the active list,' it plainly refers to Regular Army officers. An Army officer of the active list is one not only active but permanently engaged in the military service of the Government. Having chosen the Army for his career, and being actively engaged therein, the statute properly prohibits him from accepting or exercising the functions of a civil office.

"While an officer of the Volunteer Army may be said to be actively engaged in the military service, he is not permanently so engaged. He is called out to meet an emergency, and must be discharged when the purpose for which he entered the service has been accomplished. Unlike the Regular Army officer, he has not selected the military service for a profession. He has simply responded to a patriotic call, and expects when the war is over to return to civil life. His term of military service is uncertain and contingent. He may be taken from his civil duties for a few months, for a year, for two years at the most. The Government does not need nor demand a complete and final severance of his relations with civil life. He may be able to make arrangements to bridge over his absence, and on his return resume his former work."

This is not a new proposition. The Adjutant General stated in a letter to a Member of Congress on February 25, 1926, that—

"Many bills have been introduced in both Houses of Congress at different times authorizing the appointment on the retired list of the Army of those officers who served in the Volunteer Army in the Civil War, but none of them has ever been enacted into law."

Congress refused for 50 years and more to pass a law that would thus discriminate between the officers and enlisted men of the Civil War. On May 9, 1917, Hon. Newton D. Baker, then Secretary of War, in a letter to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee with reference to such a measure, made the following prophetic statement:

"Furthermore, if the bill under consideration were to be enacted into law for the benefit of men who served as volunteer officers of the Civil War, it is reasonably certain that it would be followed by other measures for the benefit of volunteer officers of the war with Spain, of officers belonging to the National Guard who have rendered or are now rendering active Federal service, and of officers of the present war not belonging to the permanent Military Establishment. It would seem that the precedent established by the enactment of such legislation for the benefit of volunteer officers of one war should, in common fairness, be followed in time by similar legislation for the benefit of volunteer officers of all wars. It can be readily seen that the expense involved in any such legislation would be enormous."

The additional expense of this bill for the first year would be $1,190,052. As time goes on the expense will grow. Men will be asking to have their cases reopened and their disabilities readjusted. Those whose disabilities shall have increased to 30 per cent will be entitled to be placed on the pension roll along with the others. And we had just as well admit that this is a permanent pension that we are being asked to allow to these disabled emergency officers. The chances are that we will soon be asked to reduce the degree of disability to 20 per cent, then to 10 per cent, and finally to wipe it out altogether, and to ultimately place the ex-officers on a pension status as officers instead of leaving them to be treated in the same manner as enlisted men. The enlisted men outnumber the officers overwhelmingly, and already some of them are asking that they be given the benefits of this retirement act in case it passes, and that they be retired as second lieutenants. Suppose pressure should be brought to bear upon Congress later to wipe out some of the discriminations of this measure by giving the enlisted men the retirement or pension status of second lieutenant. Ultimately the percentage requirement as to their disabilities would disappear. Who can tell what the ultimate expense to this Government such a pension policy would bring?

The bill is just the opening wedge. It is lifting the latch to the floodgates of expenditure, the consequences of which no one can foretell.

We regret very much that we are unable to agree with the majority of the committee that reported this bill out. But in justice to the enlisted men, who are just as patriotic and just as deserving as the officers; in justice to the many thousands of disabled emergency officers, whose disabilities are rated at less than 30 per cent; in justice to the widows and orphans of those who made the supreme sacrifice; in justice to the taxpayers of the United States on whose shoulders the burden of these expenditures would rest, we respectfully dissent from the views of the majority, and submit that this bill ought not to become a law.

If the proponents of the bill believe in it, if they are willing it should come before the House of Representatives with this body fully advised about it, they ought to be willing that the House of Representatives have the facts about it and they ought to be willing that the World War Veterans' Committee should hold hearings on it. This year I am told that over the objection of members of the committee that committee reported out the bill without a hearing, and it is before you from the great committee that has charge of it and which is asking you to follow its recommendation without hearings to help you in reaching a conclusion on it.

So for my part, while I have opposed during these years this bill coming before the Congress, if the World War Veterans' Committee will just tote fair with the House and hold open, free, complete hearings on the bill and give the Congress the facts about it, then for one I will not further oppose the bill coming before the House.

THE UNITED STATES CODE

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last line in order to offer a few constructive suggestions in regard to the use of the United States Code of Laws which was enacted a few years ago and which embraces the statute laws of the United States in force on the 7th day of December, 1925.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us read the paragraph first.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The paragraph under consideration makes reference to an enactment by Congress, and therefore involves the use of the United States Code. I have on several occasions addressed you on the use that ought to be made of this code.

The gentlemen present here this afternoon, including members of the Committee on Appropriations, and especially the lawyers on that committee, I am sure will agree with me when I say that it is the duty of Congress to enact just laws; that such enactments should be in clear and simple language, so that the people can understand them, and that after writing such laws in understandable language such laws should be codified at frequent intervals, so they can be easily found by the people who want to familiarize themselves with the laws enacted by Congress to govern the Nation.

In codifying the statute laws of the United States it must be conceded that the Congress has been extremely negligent. There was no codification of the statute laws of the United States from 1878 until the attempted codification of 1925. I have before me here the volume entitled "The Code of Laws of the United States of America," which is supposed to contain the statute laws of the United States in effect December 7, 1925.

Although this volume has been available in the office of every Member of Congress for about a year, no bill has yet been reported to this House to amend a statute of the United States by referring to such statute as it appears in this United States Code. Bills to amend existing law are introduced, considered by committees, and reported to the House, and the statutes thus sought to be amended are either referred to as appearing in the Revised Statutes, or in the Statutes at Large, or an act of a certain date. Now, it is well known that each act of Congress as it is passed is printed separately, bearing the date on which the President signed it. Such separate prints of these acts are in the possession of very few people. Of course, the original of each of these acts is in the possession of the Secretary of State.

Now this Code of Laws, in so far as it is accurate, was intended to supersede all enactments, whether found in the Revised Statutes, Statutes at Large, or other sources, prior to December 7, 1925. On page 1 of this code is what may be termed the enacting clause. A portion of paragraph (a) of section 2 of said clause reads as follows:

> The matter set forth in the code * * * shall establish prima facie the laws of the United States * * * in force on the 7th day of December, 1925.

The last sentence of this paragraph reads:

> In case of any inconsistency arising through omission or otherwise between the provisions of any section of the code and the corresponding portion of legislation heretofore enacted, effect shall be given for all purposes whatsoever to such enactments.

In this enacting clause there is no attempt to repeal any previous enactments. Although the matter set forth in the code shall establish prima facie the laws of the United States, in order to be the laws of the United States such matter must meet the test set forth in the last sentence of the paragraph to which I just referred. If there is no such inconsistency—I am now referring to the language of the last sentence of that paragraph again—in a particular section of the code, then such section is the law beyond dispute or doubt. If such inconsistency is presented in any particular section, then the corresponding portion of legislation heretofore enacted is the law and not the section wherein the inconsistency appears.

I call especial attention of the lawyers of this House to what I am about to say, and I hope I may have your attention for a few minutes, although I realize that what I am discussing now is both dry and technical. Our reluctance to make use of this Code of Laws or referring to this code in bills to amend existing statutes is probably based on fear that to make such use might invalidate the proposed act to amend existing statutes in the code. The fear is that in case the section of the code so amended should be found to contain "any inconsistency" that the amending act would thereby be invalidated.

The first proposition I want to make to you is that the sections in the code in which no inconsistency appears with corresponding portions of legislation heretofore enacted are the law, and that an act to amend one or more of such sections in the code would be valid. It would be perfectly safe to adopt the practice in this House to report bills to amend such section or sections without any other reference in such bills to previous enactments where such section or sections could be found.

For instance, about two weeks ago, when this question first came up as to what use should be made in our legislation of the United States Code, there was up for consideration a bill to amend section 2455 of the Revised Statutes. This section is reproduced in section 1171 of title 43 of the United States Code. Assuming there is no such inconsistency in section 1171 of title 43 of the United States Code as contemplated in paragraph (a) of section 2 of the enacting clause to the code, then this section is the law. Then the bill before the House to amend section 2455 of the Revised Statutes should have been a bill to amend section 1171 of title 43 of the United States Code. I furthermore think it is the duty of Members in charge of bills to amend existing statutes to find out whether the statute they seek to amend appears in the United States Code without any inconsistency. If it does so appear in the code, then use should be made of the code without any other reference to encumber the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the gentleman will wait until I get through with my statement, I shall be pleased to yield to him.

The second proposition I wish to present is this: Suppose a bill is presented and passes Congress "to amend section 1171 of title 43 of the United States Code, to read as follows." What appears after the word "follows" is what Congress intends to be the law. Now the question arises, What will be the effect of such an enactment in case the said section 1171 of title 43 of the United States Code contains "any inconsistency," such as is contemplated in the enacting clause of the code? Can there be any question about the intent of Congress? Common sense will tell anybody that the amendatory act thus passed by Congress was by Congress intended to be the law, and I think it is safe to go on the assumption that the courts in construing such an enactment would exercise the same degree of common sense that Congress exercised in enacting the amendatory law. The question presented is, Will the validity of the enactment depend upon section 1171 of title 43, United States Code, being free from "any inconsistency"? At the end of this section 1171 of title 43 of the United States Code, the section I am using as an illustration, there are, in parenthesis, references to previous enactments where this section can be found. These references are for the guidance of the courts as well as for the guidance of Congress. Will the courts, in passing on the validity of such enactment, take notice of said references in determining the intent of Congress? I am simply throwing out these suggestions for you to think about.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. If it is right on this point.

Mr. COLTON. It is right on that point.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Pardon me, but let me finish my statement, because a few moments ago I refused to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Now, the third proposition I wish to present is this—and on this I invite the attention and serious consideration of the members of the Appropriations Committee: If through fear or in the exercise of caution we deem it unsafe to refer only to the Code of Laws in bills to amend the statute laws, I am here to assert there is absolutely no excuse for the Appropriations Committee to refer in the appropriation bills to anything but the Code of Laws. The many references in every appropriation bill to acts of Congress are not for the purpose of giving validity to any appropriation. An appropriation in an appropriation bill becomes law whether based on existing law or not. Under the rules of the House, if an appropriation bill carries an item not based on existing law it is subject to a point of order. One object in referring in an appropriation bill to certain statutes or acts is to assure Members of the House that that particular appropriation is based on existing law. Furthermore, such references may aid officers in the departments who administer the appropriations authorized by Congress. Such references in the bill, whether for one or the other purpose, or for both purposes, should be made to the United States Code of Laws, because that Code of Laws is accessible to every Member of Congress and to every administrative officer in the Government. I challenge contradiction of the statements I have just presented to you on this proposition, and, in fact, I earnestly invite debate of the Members of this House on each of the three propositions I have presented to you this afternoon. Furthermore, I invite and welcome comments from any source, including the Bureau of the Budget, Comptroller General, and all administrative officers.

Mr. MADDEN. Why not take it up when the question is up?

Mr. RAMSEYER. That question is up right now. You have nearly a hundred references to statutes in this bill. I could offer an amendment to change each one of those references. However, I have no intention of doing so. There is absolutely no excuse or sense in maintaining this archaic method of referring to enactments in appropriation bills and not making use of the code for that purpose.

The excuse has been made that it is difficult to locate some of the statute laws in the United States Code. I wish to call attention to the fact that in the legislative reference service in the Library of Congress there is a complete card index showing where every enactment of Congress prior to December 7, 1925, can be found in the United States Code. The gentleman who prepared this card index and who is in charge of it is referred to in the preface to the Code of Laws in this language:

> Acknowledgment of valuable assistance is given to W. H. McClenon, of the legislative reference division of the Library of Congress, and to the law officers and other representatives of the several departments, bureaus, and commissions of the Government.

I requested Mr. McClenon to furnish me from his card index references to the United States Code for the statutes cited in this bill, H. R. 10635. I have those references before me and will insert them in the RECORD, so that Members of the House, and especially members of the Appropriations Committee, can see just how easy and simple it is to make use of the Code of Laws.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman certify to the accuracy of code citations?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I can not certify to their accuracy, but Mr. McClenon, an authority on the subject, can make such certification.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Oregon, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, had a bill and he could not find the references.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Since that time I have told the gentleman from Oregon to call upon Mr. McClenon and make use of his card index.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman does not expect the committee to keep in touch with all these matters. We have spent three hours on four bills trying to find references with the assistance of a clerk.

Mr. RAMSEYER. They have them in the legislative reference division of the Library. Make use of that service and save time.

Mr. SINNOTT. I could not find them at all. A part of the oil leasing act is not in the code.

Mr. RAMSEYER. There are a few omissions. Now, I want to show you how difficult it is to get out of a rut. On page 64, line 16, of this bill is a reference to the act of July 2, 1836. Note the date—1836. That is over 40 years before the Revised Statutes. This act of July 2, 1836, was repealed in the act of June 8, 1872, as you will find in Seventeenth Statutes at Large, section 327. This reference to the act of July 2, 1836, has undoubtedly been carried in the appropriation bills for years and years, even though the act has been repealed for over 50 years. It is certainly high time that the propositions I have presented this afternoon be given some thought and consideration by this House.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a few sheets showing the United States Code references to statutes cited in the bill under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I present the following references, to which I referred in my remarks, for printing in the RECORD:

Page 81, lines 17–23. The act entitled * * * December 6, 1924. Not in code.

The Clerk read as follows:

The appropriation "Expenses of loans," contained in section 8 of the first Liberty bond act and in section 10 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, which was made applicable by the act of June 16, 1921, to any operations arising in connection with any public debt issues made subsequently to June 30, 1921, is hereby made available for the payment of expenses of radio advertising in connection with any such issues or refunding operations.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph beginning on line 5 as legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: On page 12, after line 4, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For the payment of expenses of radio advertising in connection with public-debt issues and refunding operations in the public debt, $10,000, to be immediately available, and to be payable from the appropriation, expenses of loan, act of September 24, 1917, as amended and extended."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment upon the ground that it is legislation on an appropriation bill. I know of no law authorizing the use of the radio for advertising purposes, and the very fact that it is thought necessary to carry specific authorization in this bill shows on its face that it is legislation. The Secretary of the Treasury is given authority under the general statute to advertise, and he has so done heretofore. As a matter of fact, under the second Liberty loan he used the radio, but the hearings will show that the Comptroller General, while he permitted the accounts to pass, told him that hereafter he would not do it, because it was legislation and not authorized by law. I repeat, if it is not legislation, there is no necessity for carrying it in this bill. The fact that it is proposed shows that it is necessary to have legal authority for radio advertisement, and I insist on the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the law which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds also provides that there may be set up an appropriation equal to a percentage of the total amount of the bonds, from which he is authorized to pay all "necessary expenses." On page 898 of the hearings the Chair will find the following language:

Section 10 of the act of September 24, 1917 (second Liberty bond act), which contained the second appropriation for "Expenses of loans," reads as follows:

"That in order to pay all necessary expenses, including rent, connected with any operations under this act, except under section 12, a sum not exceeding one-fifth of 1 per cent of the amount of bonds and war savings certificates and one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of certificates of indebtedness hereon authorized is hereby appropriated, or as much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct."

It is true that the Comptroller General ruled that the language of the act was not sufficiently comprehensive to admit of the use of radio in advertising for the refunding of the bonds that were outstanding, because he said—though I think it was not a very good reason—that it was a modern appliance. If a modern appliance can not be used, what shall we use? Then, on the other hand, if the Comptroller General ratified the use of it, by the fact that he passed the account for the expenditures that had been made, but said "don't do it again," there must be some authority in the act. Where did he get his "television" that enabled him to decide that the law was good on one occasion, but would not be good later? One time he says there is law, and then he says there is not. Which decision shall we follow? What will my friend from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] do in that case? Is he going to follow the first ruling of the Comptroller General, where he authorized the payment of the bills, or the second ruling, when he said there would not be any future law for them. Undoubtedly there is law. The act provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to "pay all necessary expenses." What does that mean? I do not know how many of these bonds are out, but something over $4,000,000,000, and I think some 65 per cent, or more, of them are in denominations of from $50 to $100 each.

Irrespective of that, I contend that this is just as much in order as any other item in the bill. Newspaper advertising and all kinds of other activities are paid under this indefinite appropriation. Merely because this is the radio, which reaches more people and costs less money to reach them than any other method, is no reason why the law is not good, especially since the law provides an appropriation, "in order to pay all necessary expenses" and "to be expended as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct." Shall it be said and agreed that we are violating the rules when we set apart, as this amendment proposes to do, $10,000 out of any balance of the appropriation which was authorized under the one-fifth and the one-tenth of 1 per cent of the total amount of bonds? We are also limiting the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, rather than enlarging it, because we say to him that he can take only $10,000 out of that indefinite sum for a given purpose. We contend the purpose is not only legal but legitimate and meritorious.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has asked me which ruling of the Comptroller General I am going to rely upon. He seems to be relying upon the second ruling, in which the Comptroller General held that expenses incurred in the radio advertisement were not authorized by law. As the hearings disclose, the facts are that this amendment was requested by the Undersecretary of the Treasury, and it is put into the bill at his instance, due to the ruling of the Comptroller General that, although they did advertise through the radio in June, 1927, since the expense was incurred and the bills had been paid, he would permit the account to pass, but with the express notice that there was no law to authorize it, and that any future radio advertisements would be disapproved. I submit that if the argument of the gentleman from Illinois is correct this is already authorized by law, and there is no reason to place the amendment upon this bill. If they already have the authority, why give the authority again in this bill? When the general law was passed the radio had not been developed. Hence Congress could not have had such advertisement in mind. This is why the Comptroller General held this kind of advertising not authorized by law and why it is deemed necessary to have the authority given in this bill. It is clearly legislation and therefore not proper on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. It is merely because we want to spend it.

Mr. BYRNS. That is the reason offered by my friend a moment ago. My recollection is that the Undersecretary of the Secretary said it would cost $4,400 or $5,000, or something of that sort. But I submit, Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the Undersecretary, the real reason for this amendment is that it is necessary in order to permit the Treasury Department to advertise through the radio; and it seems to me that the very fact that the amendment is offered is a demonstration of that. There is no limitation on other forms of advertising. The gentleman from Illinois has not sought to make any limitation upon other methods of advertising that may be used by the Secretary of the Treasury which is authorized by law. It is rather strange that he would make an exception in favor of radio, if that be the fundamental reason for offering this amendment. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment is subject to a point of order and is legislation upon an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Section 8 of the act of April 24, 1917—first Liberty bond act—containing the first appropriation for "Expenses of loans," reads as follows:

That in order to pay all necessary expenses, including rent, connected with any operations under this act, a sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of bonds and one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of certificates of indebtedness herein authorized is hereby appropriated, or as much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

Section 10 of the act of September 24, 1917—second Liberty bond act—which contained the second appropriation for "Expenses of loans," contains practically the same language.

These sections have been continued and extended, and they are the law to-day, so that it seems to the Chair that the only question to be decided here is whether or not the words "necessary expenses" would warrant advertising through radio. It has been suggested that the Comptroller General has refused to recognize advertising through radio because that is a "modernism." I do not know that that is exactly the ground on which a ruling should be made here, but it seems quite clear that when this law was enacted in 1917, and continued by subsequent legislation, it was the purpose of the Congress to give to the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion to use the funds appropriated by the Government for all "necessary expenses" in carrying out the purposes of the act.

Now, is this a necessary expense? Who is to determine whether or not it is a necessary expense? It seems to the Chair that that discretion is lodged in the executive officer whose duty it is to carry out the purposes of the bill. The executive officer has found that radio is a modern means and method of advertising, and in his judgment it is a proper method to use in dealing with our debt obligations under the law above mentioned. The amendment offered here is in the form of a limitation. It limits the amount which may be expended for this particular purpose to $10,000. There is nothing in the amendment which would tend to extend or broaden the statute. The provision which was stricken out on a point of order clearly attempted to construe a statute law. Therefore under the rulings of the House it was legislation upon an appropriation bill. The Chair therefore feels that in view of the circumstances and the decisions, the words "necessary expenses" are sufficiently broad to include the item of advertising by radio, especially when a limitation is placed in the amendment. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CUSTOMS SERVICE

For collecting the revenue from customs, for the detection and prevention of frauds upon the customs revenue, and not to exceed $10,000 for the securing of evidence of violations of the customs laws, including not to exceed $5,000 for the hire of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, $18,940,000, of which such amount as may be necessary shall be available for salaries of general appraisers and justices of the United States Customs Court retired under the provisions of section 518 of the tariff act of 1922, and $169,800 shall be available for personal services in the District of Columbia exclusive of eight persons from the field force authorized to be detailed under section 525 of the tariff act of 1922: Provided, That not to exceed $10,000 of the total amount appropriated shall be available for advances to be made by disbursing officers when authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, the provisions of section 3648 of the Revised Statutes to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order against the proviso in order to get some information from the chairman of the committee as to what this proviso covers and the reason for it. It is clearly legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. This proviso has been in the bill for a great many years. The $10,000 referred to is for the purpose of advancing funds in special cases to get information upon which they can disclose violations of the customs law. The United States sends agents abroad to get advance information about smuggling, so that by the time the smuggler gets over here the authorities will have all the necessary information to make arrests.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. The reservation is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Refunding taxes illegally collected: For refunding taxes illegally collected under the provisions of sections 3220 and 3689, Revised Statutes, as amended by the revenue acts of 1918, 1921, 1924, and 1926, including the payment of claims for the fiscal year 1929 and prior years, $132,000,000: Provided, That a report shall be made to Congress of the disbursements hereunder as required by such acts, including the names of all persons and corporations to whom payments are made together with the amount paid to each: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be available to refund any amount paid by or collected from any manufacturer, producer, or importer in respect of the tax imposed by subdivision (3) of section 600 of the revenue act of 1924, or subdivision (3) of section 900 of the revenue act of 1921, or of the revenue act of 1918, unless the Commissioner of Internal Revenue certifies to the proper disbursing officer that such manufacturer, producer, or importer has filed with the commissioner, under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a bond in such sum and with such sureties as the commissioner deems necessary, conditioned upon the immediate repayment to the United States of such portion of the amount refunded as is not distributed by such manufacturer, producer, or importer, within six months after the date of the payment of the refund, to the persons who purchased for purposes of consumption (whether from such manufacturer, producer, importer, or from any other person) the articles in respect of which the refund is made, as evidenced by the affidavits (in such form and containing such statements as the commissioner may prescribe) of such purchasers, and that such bond, in the case of a claim allowed after the passage of this act, was filed before the allowance of the claim by the commissioner.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 19, line 8, strike out the figures "$132,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$130,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF PROHIBITION

For expenses to enforce the provisions of the national prohibition act and the act entitled "An act to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon, all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or cocoa leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes," approved December 17, 1914, as amended by the revenue act of 1918, and the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to prohibit the importation and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes,' approved February 9, 1909," as amended by the act of May 26, 1922, known as "the narcotic drugs import and export act," including the employment of executive officers, agents, inspectors, chemists, assistant chemists, supervisors, clerks, and messengers in the field and in the Bureau of Prohibition in the District of Columbia, to be appointed as authorized by law; the securing of evidence of violations of the acts; the purchase of such supplies, equipment, mechanical devices, laboratory supplies, books, and such other expenditures as may be necessary in the District of Columbia and the several field offices; hire, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled or horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles when necessary; and for rental of necessary quarters; in all, $12,729,140, of which amount not to exceed $658,320 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia: Provided, That not to exceed $1,350,440 of the foregoing sum shall be expended for enforcement of the provisions of the said acts of December 17, 1914, and May 26, 1922, and the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize the use by narcotic agents of motor vehicles confiscated under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1925, and pay the maintenance, repair, and operation thereof from this allotment: Provided further, That no money herein appropriated for the enforcement of the national prohibition act, the customs laws, or internal revenue laws shall be used to pay for storage in any private warehouse of intoxicating liquors or other property in connection therewith seized pursuant to said acts and necessary to be stored, where there is available for that purpose space in a Government warehouse or other suitable Government property in the judicial district wherein such property was seized, or in an adjacent judicial district, and when such seized property is stored in an adjacent district the jurisdiction over such property in the district wherein it was seized shall not be affected thereby: Provided further, That for purpose of concentration, upon the initiation of the Commissioner of Prohibition and under regulations by him, distilled spirits may be removed from any internal-revenue bonded warehouse to any other such warehouse, and may be bottled in bond in any such warehouse before or after payment of the tax, and the commissioner shall prescribe the form and penal sums of bond covering distilled spirits in internal-revenue bond warehouses, and in transit between such warehouses.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment and make the point of order of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twelve Members are present, a quorum. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LINTHICUM: At the end of line 15, page 22, insert: "Provided further, That no money herein appropriated for the enforcement of the national prohibition act shall be used in the preparation or issue of any permit for the removal or use of any industrial alcohol known to be denatured by any poisonous drug or other material injurious to the human system."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to one hour and that the time shall alternate between those opposed to the amendment and those in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to one hour and that the time shall alternate between those opposed to the amendment and those in favor of the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have introduced this amendment for the purpose of prohibiting a custom which has grown up in the Prohibition Unit, which is called by Senator JAMES A. REED a most damnable custom, a custom which allows the Prohibition Unit to put poison in alcohol when they know that of the 60,000,000 gallons of industrial alcohol which was issued 6,000,000 gallons would go to the bootleggers and become the drink of the country. They poisoned this alcohol, and the consequence has been that in this country we have had 11,700 deaths from poisoned liquor, including that directly attributable to alcohol which was poisoned and by virtue of such poison caused death from cirrhosis of the liver.

Senator JAMES A. REED said to Doctor Doran:

Do you not think that it is a very wicked thing, when you know that 10 per cent of your products are getting out to the people, to put in poison or substances that are so subtle that people will drink them without knowing and destroy their health and life? Do you not think that it is about the nearest approach to murder that a man can commit? * * * You put the poison in it, and you know that 1 drop out of every 10 is going to be drunk by some human being * * *. You gentlemen are officers of the law, paid by the public, and you tell me that you take 60,000,000 gallons of alcohol and render it poisonous and of the 60,000,000 gallons, 6,000,000 gallons are going to be drunk by human beings, the effect being deleterious in some instances and poisonous in others. * * * Now, even if this unfortunate creature who drinks knows that he is getting it from a bootlegger, are not you after all doing something that can not be justified in morals or anything else? * * * I think you are poisoning the American people. I think it is wicked; I think it is infamous; I think it is damnable.

I do not propose to discuss the matter to any great length, but it seems to me that if there ever was anything done by this Government which has been most injurious to the people of the country it has been this habit of absolutely poisoning the alcohol which it was known would get into the hands of people who drink liquor, and when the Prohibition Unit knew that 6,000,000 gallons of this denatured alcohol, poisoned under the authority and with the permission of the Government, would get into the hands of people who would drink the same.

I am not talking about the enforcement of the Volstead Act, because I think there are other ways in which it can be enforced. This amendment only prohibits the issuance of any permit which allows the distribution or withdrawal of industrial alcohol which is poisoned or which has some drug in it that is injurious to the human system.

Statistics for 1926 showing a startling increase in the death rate from alcoholism and from cirrhosis of the liver, a disease attributed to alcohol, have just been made public. Not only do they indicate the constantly increasing use of liquor under the Volstead Act but they indicate an increasing one of poisoned liquor. The figures obtained from the United States Bureau of the Census show that in virtually every State, whether called "wet" or "dry," the death rate has been mounting.

Between 1914 and the taking effect of the Volstead Act, January 17, 1920, there had been a steady decrease in the number of deaths from alcoholism until the rate then stood at 1 per 100,000. In 1926, the last available figures just made public, it had risen to 3.9 per 100,000, or practically four times greater. In 1920 the rate of deaths from cirrhosis of the liver was 6.2; in the figures for 1926, just made public, it was 7.5, many of which deaths were caused by poisoned liquor.

The seriousness of this subject was recognized by the conference of State health officers, which met in Washington last May, and it was proposed that a commission of experts be named to study conditions from the standpoint of public health, but the United States Public Health Service, which is a bureau in the Treasury Department, which in turn is responsible for prohibition enforcement, opposed it and it was not adopted.

Certainly the death in one year of 11,700 persons from alcohol and its poisonous ingredients should receive even the sympathy of prohibition fanatics.

When we try to humanize this Volstead Act we are falsely accused, but the work will continue until this great question is rightfully decided.

I went into a discussion of this whole question yesterday, and I hope I brought out clearly why I think the Volstead Act should be modified. But no question about modification is before us at this time. There is no question as to whether you believe in prohibition or whether you do not believe in prohibition. There is no question as to whether you believe in temperance or do not believe in temperance. The great question before you to-day is whether you believe in the enforcement of the act by poisoning the liquor which is bound to get into the hands of the people and when the Government knows that 6,000,000 gallons will eventually reach them. Ten thousand gallons of poisoned alcohol mean 80,000 quarts of gin and it means 120,000 quarts of whisky. So when you poison 10,000 gallons of alcohol you poison 80,000 quarts of gin and you poison 120,000 quarts of whisky. You can from this calculate just what it means when 6,000,000 gallons of alcohol is consumed.

It is for this committee to say as to whether it approves of our Government poisoning people through this denatured poison when some other denaturant can be used which does not poison the human system, causing death or ill health.

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. WELLER. Have the gentleman's studies with reference to poisoned liquor led him to any figures or statistics with reference to the whisky and alcohol sold by drug stores under permit?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I can say to the gentleman, as I said in my speech yesterday, that the liquor consumed in this country costs about $2,807,000,000 for bootlegged and moonshine goods. I do not know how much liquor sold in the drug stores is consumed. Much liquor is kept in the drug stores and sold on prescription. It is quite a vast quantity, but I have not been able to get any figures upon it.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman kindly tell the House the quantity and the character of the drugs or poisons that are put into liquor by the Government?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am not informed as to the quantity or character of poisons they put into it, but I know it was admitted by Doctor Doran that 6,000,000 gallons of poisoned alcohol went into the hands of those people who drink it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment upon the ground that while the language of the amendment is in the form of a limitation that really it amounts to the enactment of a new legislative policy, and that is not permissible under the rules of the House on an appropriation bill.

Supporting the point of order, I would cite the Chair to a brief statement of a decision rendered by Chairman LUCE on January 8, 1925, reported in paragraph 825 of the Rules of the House as contained in the manual. Mr. LUCE, the Chairman, in that decision said:

> In construing a proposed limitation, if the Chair finds the purpose to be legislative, in that the intent is to restrict executive discretion to a degree that may be fairly termed a change in policy rather than a matter of administrative detail, he should sustain the point of order.

The present Volstead Act contains a provision that permits the issuance of permits for the use of alcohol for industrial purposes, but it also demands that such industrial alcohol shall be denatured so that it will be unfit for use for beverage purposes. If the amendment that is now pending should be enacted, practically that part of the Volstead Act would be repealed and the Secretary would not be able to issue permits for alcohol to be used for industrial purposes. He would have to scrap all of his formulas for denaturing alcohol. I submit, if the amendment is adopted it amounts to the enactment of a legislative policy and therefore is in contravention of the rules of the House.

I make the point of order upon that ground. It is really tantamount to the enactment of a new legislative policy and is not a limitation on an appropriation bill in the sense that limitations are in order.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, only a few days ago the question was up whether we could put a limitation on a bill prohibiting the Government or the War Department from transporting troops into foreign territory. My amendment is very similar to that amendment then proposed and which was ruled in order by the Chair at that time. That, also, if passed, would have changed the policy of the National Government, especially the policy of the present administration, because it is transporting troops into foreign territory. It is supplying troops in foreign territory, and the adoption of that amendment, which was ruled in order by the Chair, would have changed the whole policy of the present administration upon that subject. Now, the policy which we propose to change is the policy of poisoning American citizens by inserting poisonous drugs in industrial alcohol which is issued under these permits. If the amendment which was ruled in order the other day, and which was a limitation, was proper then, certainly this amendment is proper now.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say in reply to some of the things which have been said that the purpose of these permits is not to permit alcohol to be withdrawn for beverage purposes but for industrial purposes. There is nothing before the House as a scientific fact that we may know that it is possible to really denature alcohol without putting something in it that is harmful or poisonous to the human system. Certainly you would not denature alcohol by flavoring it up so as to make it pleasant for the human taste. It is probably not possible to denature alcohol without putting into it some unwholesome substance; and yet if this amendment is enacted the whole legislative policy would be changed; and it might be beyond the possibilities to permit alcohol to be withdrawn for industrial purposes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, the facts are that Doctor Doran, who is now in charge of prohibition enforcement, stated that 60,000,000 gallons of industrial alcohol is withdrawn every year. He also stated that he knew that 6,000,000, or 10 per cent thereof, is used for beverage purposes in this country. He stated it was all poisoned, and Senator REED called it a most damnable act to poison American citizens. I do not know that this amendment will change the policy of the Government, but if it is the policy of the Government to poison American citizens, it ought to be changed, and that is the purpose of this amendment. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] the other day voted for the amendment which prohibited the National Government or the War Department from transporting troops into foreign territory. This amendment is on all fours with that.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Oh, that is not a change of legislative policy.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That would have changed the whole policy of the Government.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. No; there is no legislative policy that authorizes the President to send American troops into a foreign country.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And there is no legislation that authorizes the Prohibition Bureau to poison American citizens, but they do it just the same, and they kill thousands more people than they do in Nicaragua.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Oh, well, of course they do not do that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. They do do it.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. There is a law that authorizes the Prohibition Bureau to issue permits for industrial alcohol and the affirmative requirement is that it be denatured.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And the Prohibition Bureau passes upon the substance through which it is to be denatured, because I talked to them and they told me that themselves.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the point of order, of course we understand that with the merits of the proposition we have nothing to do. Whether a limitation on the expenditure of an appropriation changes the policy of the Government, by prohibiting or preventing through lack of money for that purpose a course of action which the Government has heretofore pursued, has nothing whatever to do with the determination of the question. An amendment is simply a limitation if the money hereby appropriated may not be spent for a certain specific purpose. If that is all the amendment does, it is a limitation.

This proposed amendment does not impose new duties on any official of the Government. It does not vest any official of the Government with discretion that he at present has not. It does not change a substantive law on any subject. It merely says that the money herein appropriated shall not be spent for this purpose, which is a clear purpose that requires no discretion, no affirmative administrative action to ascertain its application, or anything of that sort. Therefore it is clearly a limitation and in order.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey is not quite correct. The amendment that has been proposed, it is true, does not vest any official of the Government with a discretion he does not have now. It does not add any discretion which officials of the Government do not now have, but it does, on the contrary, take away a discretion which they do have.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does not every limitation take away from an official the discretion to spend the money?

Mr. CRAMTON. The limitation may properly take away from the official the opportunity to spend the money, but the limitation, to be in order, must not change the law under which he must act in the performance of his official duties. Under the law the Commissioner of Prohibition is required to pass upon applications for permits for the withdrawal of certain alcohol for industrial use. In order to protect the use of that alcohol, in order that he may perform his duty and be sure that the alcohol is used not for beverage purposes but only industrially, he has the authority to require certain ingredients put in the alcohol, and certain formulas are submitted to him and approved by him.

This amendment does not say that he may not use any money in passing on applications for permits. If that were the amendment, however unwise it might be, it would be parliamentary—if the amendment read, "none of this money shall be used in the supervision of the issuance of permits," that would be parliamentary and in order.

Instead of that it says that he can use this money only in issuing permits for certain kinds of alcohol, permits for the use of industrial alcohol according to certain formulas. Now, that is a change of substantive law. It limits the discretion of all officials, and under our rules a limitation may not limit the discretion of officials or add to their discretion or place new duties on them. It is clearly, Mr. Chairman, not in order under the rule as to limitations.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the Chair indulge me a few more words?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. LEHLBACH. All the amendment does is to say to the official you may not spend this money to secure the placing in industrial alcohol poisonous or other injurious substances. It does not vest them with discretion. Every inhibition to spend money takes away from the official the discretion of spending the money for that purpose. All this limitation does is to say you can not exercise your discretion in the use of poison in alcohol.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, if I understood the reading of the amendment the latter part says—will the Chair give me the latter part of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment reads:

Provided further, That no money herein appropriated for the enforcement of the national prohibition act shall be used in the preparation or issue of any permit for the removal or use of any industrial alcohol known to be denatured by any poisonous drug or other material injurious to the human system.

Mr. HOCH. It is the latter part that I have reference to. I concur in the argument made by the gentleman from New Jersey with the possible exception of the last few words, "injurious to the human system." If it said which contains some particular substance so there would be no exercise of judgment I think it would be simply a limitation on the expenditure of this money and therefore in order under the rule. But if it imposes a duty on the officials to go into a chemical examination or analysis to determine whether certain substances are injurious to the human system then I think this goes beyond a mere limitation and imposes a new duty on the officials.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Kansas I wish to say that if it required study, if it required analysis, if it required any protracted labor or examination to ascertain what is injurious to the human system there might be some merit in the argument of the gentleman from Kansas. But any child of reasonable intelligence who goes to a grammar school knows that the substances used to denature alcohol are injurious to the human system.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that the gentleman states a fact when he says that there is no question about the things that are injurious to the human system. There might be, and probably is, a great difference of opinion in respect to that. In fact, the gentlemen who are urging this amendment claim that alcohol itself is helpful to the human system, while others assert that it is injurious. An amendment to an appropriation bill, offered as a limitation, must clearly come within the rules of the House in order to make it in order as a limitation. It seems to me that the latter part of this amendment does place a new discretion and a new duty upon an administrative officer. In other words, it would not be a clear case of whether this money was to be spent or not. In order to bring it within the rule of limitation it must be a case so clear that the administrative officer will have no question whatever as to whether this money should be expended for that purpose, and as soon as it is not clear, and he is compelled to determine something, then I think we have gone beyond the rules of the House as to limitations, and have imposed upon this administrative officer a new duty.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman, of course, is aware that all of these denaturants are passed on by the Prohibition Unit before they are used, and they know just what drug or other material is used in every bit of industrial alcohol for which they issue permits; so that it is a knowledge they already have.

Mr. HOCH. They know what drug is used, but the question of whether it is injurious to the human system is another matter.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Any medical encyclopedia would tell them what the effect of the drugs are.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make this one more observation. We must recognize that we are not dealing with medicinal liquors in this pending amendment. Medicinal liquor is prescribed by a physician. Under the Volstead Act the Prohibition Unit has the right to issue permits for the use of industrial alcohol, but must require that it be denatured. Naturally the Prohibition Commissioner, from humane motives, undertakes to prescribe formulas that will be as little harmful as possible to the human system if the alcohol be unlawfully diverted to beverage purposes. He does that, of course, because he recognizes that some unfortunate may get hold of the liquor and drink it, and he naturally uses all of the scientific knowledge that is at his command in order to prescribe formulas that will not be harmful to the human system. But if we adopt this amendment it will then become the affirmative duty of the commissioner, if he issues these permits for industrial alcohol, to make an exhaustive research to see that any formula used will not be harmful to the human system. It must be remembered that we are dealing with industrial alcohol and the law requires that it be denatured. To denature alcohol does not mean to flavor it up with vanilla extract or other pleasant-tasting flavors. That would not be denaturing alcohol, but would be making it pleasant for beverage purposes.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Why should he not make an exhaustive investigation?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. He does, but you might by this sort of a limitation put it beyond his powers to issue any permit for industrial alcohol.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I think we are putting it within his power to do it by that amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, from a hurried reference to the Volstead Act there is a requirement in section 2 of Title III that—

Any person hereafter establishing a plant for the production of alcohol shall likewise before operation make application, file bond, and receive permit.

Again, in section 11 of the same title, under "tax-free alcohol," there is a provision that any person permitted to obtain alcohol tax free, except the United States, and so forth, shall first apply for and secure a permit to purchase the same and give the bonds described under Title I, but alcohol withdrawn for nonbeverage purposes for use of the United States, and so forth, does not apply.

It is made the duty of the Commissioner of Prohibition to issue a permit for the use of alcohol for nonbeverage purposes. This amendment limits the discretion of the official in performing that duty. If the amendment should provide that this money could be used for passing upon applications for permits, that would be a proper limitation, so far as the parliamentary situation is concerned, but when they go further and say that the Commissioner of Prohibition must continue to pass on those applications for permits and that in passing on them he shall not have the authority he has heretofore had, he shall not be permitted to require certain formulas to be used, certain denaturants to be used, but must permit only the use of such denaturants as he holds are not injurious if used as a beverage, he is immediately called upon and forced to exercise a determination as to whether or not they are injurious. You will put that new duty upon him to determine whether that which is used in order to prevent the use of alcohol for beverage purposes is going to be noninjurious if used for beverage purposes. It adds a new responsibility and it takes away a wide discretion that he now has.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, of course, has had no opportunity to make any investigation of this matter other than the arguments presented on the floor. Those arguments, of course, present different views and are far from satisfying. Each of the eminent parliamentarians discussing the matter is thoroughly satisfied that he is absolutely correct in his deductions. The Chair has no such certainty of opinion. However, at first blush the Chair believes that this amendment is a limitation, such a limitation as is permitted under the rules and precedents of the House.

It does not require an investigation; it does not interfere with the discretion of an officer; nor does it necessarily change a policy. A limitation merely provides that the money appropriated may not be used for a certain purpose, whether that purpose changes a policy or nullifies an act. It is a restriction upon the use of the money. That is all that this amendment does.

As to whether or not it interferes with the discretionary power of the enforcement officer of the prohibition law to such an extent as to change the policy of the department is another matter, but the Chair feels that the enactment of this amendment would not change the policy. So far as an investigation being necessary on the part of the enforcement officer is concerned, the Chair finds the language to be, "shall be used in the preparation or issue of any permit for the removal or use of any industrial alcohol known to be denatured by any poisonous drug or other material injurious to the human system," and the Chair does not feel that that would require an investigation, an extensive investigation, on the part of the enforcement officer. It does not appear that additional duties are imposed upon an officer. It provides how this money shall be expended. Regardless of the Chair's opinion as to the merits of the amendment, he feels constrained to overrule the point of order.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to take the time of the House for a few moments, first of all, to answer a statement advanced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] a few days ago which reflected upon the fair name of the city of Buffalo, N. Y., and also to say something about the great problem that we have along the Niagara frontier, which, in my judgment, is very germane to this section of the bill making appropriations for the regulation of the importation and exportation of intoxicating liquors. The gentleman [Mr. LAGUARDIA] stated—to use his exact language I read from the RECORD:

> The sad feature about this is that a close investigation of this office—to which the gentleman refers—will find several agents of the Government going there at stated intervals; that breweries in New York City, Kingston, in Poughkeepsie, in Westchester County, and also in Erie and Monroe Counties, operate through this clearing house.

Now, my friends, that is not true. I deny that there are any breweries operating illegally in Buffalo. I deny that there is any protection given to breweries in my particular section of the country. Let me read to you a statement from the Buffalo Evening News of Wednesday, February 1, the day before the gentleman made his charges:

> One hundred and sixty thousand dollars in beer to be destroyed—Ontario's new law spoils "near-beer" trade here, so East Buffalo brewery will quit business.

Talking about the sad features, that certainly is the sad feature.

> Five thousand barrels of beer, all of preprohibition strength, will be destroyed by dry agents, acting in conjunction with employees of the Ebbco Beverage Co., operators of the $400,000 East Buffalo brewery in Emslie Street, near Williams Street, as the result of the decision of the officers of the company Tuesday to surrender the corporation's cereal beverage permit and retire from the brewing business.
> This company has been in business for 60 years, and prior to prohibition occupied an outstanding position in the brewing industry. Employees were given written notice to-day of the discontinuance of the business.
> With Ontario breweries providing good standard beer and ales, the market for prohibition near beer in the Buffalo area has diminished almost to the vanishing point, and that fact and the constantly increasing regulation to which cereal beverage manufacturers are subjected by the Prohibition Department are assigned by officers of the company as the governing reason in their decision to retire from the cereal beverage business.
> It is useless for us to attempt further competition when Canadian breweries are all making brews of proper strength—with emphasis on the word "proper."

Now, my friends, prohibition in this country and temperance or personal liberty in Canada makes this international problem a most serious one. With New York, on one side of the Niagara River, as dry as the Sahara Desert, and Ontario, just across the river, as wet as the river that separates us from that land of promise, we find a great and serious situation developing day by day; so much so that some patriotic citizens decided to build a great concrete bridge that would connect the city of Buffalo with the Dominion of Canada and bring us closer together in friendship, in spirit, and perhaps in spirits. [Laughter.]

This bridge was dedicated on the 4th day of July, the day we celebrate our independence—save the mark—and on that great day the Prince of Wales and many other princes of good fellows joined in dedicating that wonderful structure. Thousands of people crossed the bridge that day into the moist Province of Canada, and when many of them returned they were as unconstitutional as any good quart of Scotch ever happened to be. [Laughter.]

When the discussion came up about the building of this great bridge some people complained because of its cost. It was to cost in the neighborhood of $5,000,000. But many of them, who have since used the bridge, say it is worth a hundred millions. [Laughter.] Others contend that it would have been better for this country to have built a pipe line, with one end of it open in the city of Buffalo. [Laughter.]

Astounding statistics on the continued growth of Canadian liquor exports to the United States, despite United States dry laws, have just been compiled at the Canadian capital. They show an increase of over $2,000,000 in the 1927 Canadian-United States booze business over the 1926 figures.

Whisky exports from Canada to the United States—here are the monthly totals for the two years 1926 and 1927:

	1927	1926
January	$1,774,533	$1,241,013
February	1,112,825	1,056,629
March	1,699,928	1,616,213
April	905,684	790,581
May	1,342,754	749,156
June	1,696,680	1,382,308
July	1,228,577	1,216,474
August	1,407,055	1,119,205
September	1,718,685	1,490,002
October	1,625,713	1,459,272
November	−1,603,392	+1,774,784
December	1,600,000	1,579,343

In addition to the above big totals, there were exported from Canada to the United States during 1927 foreign liquors to the value of $2,500,000, as compared with $1,183,533 in the corresponding period in 1926, and also some $6,000,000 worth of beer, gin, and other beverages.

CANADA EXPORTS $26,000,000

The monthly comparisons of Canadian booze shipments to the United States will show that there was an increase over every corresponding month of 1926, excepting in November, when, for some reason—probably a brief period of activity by preventive officers—the month's total showed a decline of about $170,000 over November of 1926.

The same Government compilations provided an eye opener for Canadians in another respect, and that was that the dominion is spending about $1,000,000 a week on alcoholic beverages. The domestic production of whisky, gin, beer, and other strong drinks amounts to $40,000,000 per annum. And Canada has imported during the 12 months of 1927 another $40,000,000 worth. Of the total quantity Canada exported to the United States and other countries $26,000,000 worth, keeping $54,000,000 worth to quench the thirsts of its own 9,000,000 people.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object. Of course, if this is to be taken out of the 30 minutes given to those in favor of the amendment, I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The time will come out of the 30 minutes given to those in favor of the amendment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I understood I was to control 30 minutes of the time and that the gentleman from Illinois was to control 30 minutes of the time. I wish to say that I have two requests for time, and I ask the Chair to bear that in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize gentlemen for five minutes. Any additional time must be gained by the unanimous consent of the committee. The Chair again states: Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that he may proceed for five additional minutes?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, let us understand. That would be a part of the 30 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. That would be a part of the 30 minutes in favor of the amendment. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York.

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Connecting up my story, I want to say that the problem which confronts us along the Niagara frontier is due, of course, to the fact that Canada has repealed prohibition and substituted Government control, with the result that the citizens of the United States, taking advantage of the situation, journey over to Canada in large numbers.

On the Canadian side of the river, on what was formerly mere pasture land, there is in the building a great city, 25 miles in length. They are constructing club houses, building athletic institutions, summer homes; in fact, a great city is being built, to the economic loss of our side of the river and the enrichment of the wise Province of Ontario.

As an example, here is an invitation that came to me a few days ago from a newly formed Country Club in Canada:

JAMES M. MEAD, Esq.

DEAR SIR: There will be a social for the members, their families, and friends Sunday, February 12, from 2.30 p. m. to 12 m.

Try and come over and have a real day's enjoyment in our new clubhouse—

And so forth.

Many of these clubs are being formed over there for the accommodation of our citizens, and I want you to know the hospitality of our Canadian friends is unbounded. On one occasion a Buffalonian went over there to get a permit to buy his ration of liquor. When asked where he lived he was a little reluctant as to whether he ought to tell a lie and give a Canadian address. The clerk in the store actually thought of an address and gave it to him. So, my friends, they have the welcome sign out for Americans all the time, and while we are trying to hinder Canadians from coming into our country by our strict enforcement of the immigration laws, they are welcoming Americans by the thousands into their country. In that they are as wise as we are stupid.

The Ontario Tourist Bureau is pleased to report that for the past season tourists entering the Province by automobile spent something over $40,000,000, an increase of 48 per cent over 1926. Wet now.

Included in the expenditure is $80,600 for liquor licenses. How much was spent for the liquor obtained with the licenses is not given by the bureau, but a statistician on the outside figures that it might reach the full total of expenditures given by the bureau.

All together about $300,000 went into the imperial treasury from the visitors from this side the line.

Ontario is a beautiful country and it has some fine fishing grounds. There are beautiful spots in the United States, too, and some excellent fishing is to be had without going so far afield; but the fishing on this side, notwithstanding the eagerness of the trout to bite, is rather dry compared to that in Ontario, so New York must grin and bear it.

Ontario stands for national decency, for honesty, public integrity, and a high standard of morals, while hypocrisy, deceit, lawbreaking, and debauchery is rampant under prohibition in our land.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is recognized for five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment vitally involves the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. More than that, I have the word of Doctor Doran that it involves the prosperity of many great industries in this country.

It is interesting to me to see what the policy is to be of the wet bloc in the House as presented by its newly chosen leader, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM]. The policy of our other friend from Maryland, John Philip Hill, was to destroy the eighteenth amendment by authorizing beer and wine, but it is apparent that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], the new leader, has on his banner, "Hamstring enforcement in any way we can do it."

Now, on yesterday the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] announced his implicit confidence in Doctor Doran, the Commissioner of Prohibition. That is the only thing my friend from Massachusetts ever said on this question with which I agree entirely with him. I have implicit confidence in Doctor Doran, and this House has implicit confidence in him. Doctor Doran has the responsibility of enforcing the law, and it is beneath the dignity of Members of this body to attempt to take steps which are only intended to destroy the work of enforcement. Doctor Doran is the man who has the responsibility. Every Member of this House ought to be behind him in his efforts to enforce the law. What does Doctor Doran say about this amendment? I just called him on the telephone. I read the amendment to him. What does Doctor Doran, who has the responsibility, who has studied the question, who is the chemist who had to do with these formulas before he became Prohibition Commissioner, say about the proposed amendment? He says:

It would not only be destructive of enforcement, it would be destructive of industries as well; it is so far-reaching as to be nothing but nonsensical.

Doctor Doran tells me there are 95,000,000 gallons of alcohol lawfully used in industry, great industries already built up, and there is a constant increase in its lawful use. If this amendment goes through, he says that tremendous industries will immediately be destroyed because they will not be able to get the kind of alcohol they need in their industry. I hope even my friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] would not desire to destroy, hamper, and interfere with great industries, even if he is willing to destroy enforcement of law.

This amendment provides that there can be no permit for the issuance of industrial alcohol denatured by any poisonous drug. Doctor Doran tells me that there is no industrial alcohol now issued but what is denatured by some denaturant that would be injurious if used for beverage purposes. So the amendment would say that no permit could be issued for the issuance of industrial alcohol denatured in any way, because——

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask the gentleman a question. The statistics show that 11,700——

Mr. CRAMTON. Just put the question. I do not care for the debate.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I can get to it quicker in this way.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am sorry, but I can not yield except for a question.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of using poison to denature industrial alcohol and thereby murder the people of this country?

Mr. CRAMTON. Since I want to see the law enforced, and the greatest good to the greatest number will come through enforcement of the law, I am willing to have used as a denaturant that which it is necessary to have used in order to make it effective. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Even poison?

Mr. CRAMTON. And when one draws this for one purpose and unlawfully uses it for another he has full notice; and Doctor Doran states there is no denaturant now used that would not be forbidden under this proposed amendment.

Adoption of the amendment, I will say to the committee, therefore only means one of two things: Either no permits are to be issued, or there must be a free use of alcohol without any denaturant whatever. This would, on the one hand, destroy utterly enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, and, on the other hand, would cripple and destroy many great industries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA, Mr. SIROVICH, and Mr. PALMISANO rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am as "wet" as any man in this House, and I have been consistently opposing prohibition, but there is only one way to do it and that is by constitutional or legislative methods. You can not do it in any other way.

Denatured alcohol is nothing new. You had denatured alcohol before you had prohibition and if a "wet," so-called, desires to take the attitude that our function here is to get "hooch" made of colored raw alcohol on the market, then you can consistently vote for this amendment; but this is not going to hasten but retard the day when Congress will have to deal with this subject intelligently, constructively, and basically.

What we, as "wets," ought to do, gentlemen, is not to offer an amendment of this kind, but insist upon the Prohibition Bureau having sufficient men, appropriating enough money so that not one ounce of denatured alcohol can find its way into channels where it will be used for beverage purposes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask the gentleman what he estimates that would cost the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is just my point. That is the attitude I have assumed. If the American people want prohibition, if our friends the "drys" here are sincere, it will cost them anywhere from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000.

Mr. O'CONNELL. And then they will not enforce it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And then they can not enforce it, and then the American people, I will say to the gentleman from Maryland, will realize that this law is humanly impossible of enforcement; but this nibbling at it by ineffective amendments will in no way help the cause.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; I do not yield to the gentleman from Florida. Florida is so happily situated near the West Indies that you get all the pure liquor you want and it is hypocritical to take any stand as to law enforcement.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Florida will always take the stand of upholding the laws of our Nation and the integrity of those laws.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And there are more prohibition lawbreakers in the gentleman's State, in proportion to population, than there are in my State.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. I do not think the gentleman can prove that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, I have been down to Miami.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. I hope the gentleman goes there and stays there, I will say to my friend. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, gentlemen, what we ought to do here is to add $50,000,000 a year to this appropriation and to create a force that will go into every State. I pointed out here the other day that we have about 2,034 agents.

That would not permit even 10 to 1 in the largest 250 cities in the United States. Do you not see that the law is only being partially, locally enforced here and there. It is hardly being enforced in the so-called dry States. We will get nowhere until we bring the facts right home to the American people. Until we so enforce the law and dry up the dry States, and it will cost hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the gentleman recommend us to vote against this amendment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CAREW. Does the gentleman intend to vote against it?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I am going to vote against it; I am here not to facilitate the bootlegger; I am here to seek a change in the law by constitutional and legislative means. [Applause.] That is my attitude, and I stick to it. I do not care if all of the bootleggers in New York are opposed to me; the gentleman can have them if he wishes. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, naturally I am opposed to this wet amendment. This is only the annual fight that the so-called wets make against the enforcement of the law. Since the rider of the great white charger from Baltimore has disappeared from the scene of battle his mantle has fallen on the shoulders of another gentleman from Maryland, our distinguished friend [Mr. LINTHICUM].

There was offered in their last fight on the floor by one of the most distinguished Members of Congress, who was specially selected for the purpose, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER, who was formerly president of the American Bar Association, an amendment that would absolutely tie the hands and feet of every prohibition-enforcement officer in the land, and the House by an overwhelming vote defeated it.

What does our friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] want to do about this lawless liquor? Does he want to make it so palatable to the taste that everybody will want to drink it? What does he want to do with this lawless stuff? He has taken an oath to uphold and support and defend against all enemies foreign and domestic against this Constitution, and what does he now want to do about it? Does he want to make this liquor so that it will be an inducement, a special temptation to people to violate the law?

Why, before the constitutional amendment was passed, before Volstead was ever heard of, there was poison placed in denatured alcohol. The time now is no different from the former times in that respect. The Government is doing what it has been doing for years, and I am glad to see the distinguished now orthodox Republican, my friend from New York, Mr. LAGUARDIA, oppose this amendment; he is in favor of the law and will endeavor to defend the fundamental law of the land.

This amendment is ridiculous. It will get a few more votes than the Henry St. George Tucker amendment, because some will justify their vote from a sentimental standpoint, from a humanitarian standpoint, and say that we do not want some poor fellow to get hold of poison. Why, my friends, they can drink numerous other poisons now if they want to; there are lots of poisons procurable in drug stores, if they want deliberately to drink it. They know that denatured alcohol is poison. Have the citizens of this land become so helpless that they have to have Grandmother LINTHICUM, from Maryland, walk around with them to protect them from poisoned alcohol? [Laughter.] Do they have to have special laws and protection from the wets of the country to keep them from drinking this injurious alcohol? You will get a few more votes. There is one thing about the wets, however, that I like, and that is that they never give up, even when engaged in a hopeless cause. They have got their full forces here now. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] is here to help them on this momentous occasion. I see that they have their full membership here, but when the vote is counted they again will have only a handful and yet they come back month after month and year after year to continue their hopeless battle.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman and fellow Members of the House, for almost a quarter of a century I have been in the practice of medicine.

Never have I participated in the drinking of any alcoholic beverages. In my opinion the use of liquor has never destroyed the lives of human beings, but the abuse of it has. Moderation has been my precept in every form of indulgence. In my humble opinion the greatest evil of this country to-day is overindulgence in every line of endeavor. Thus we have two patent examples of overindulgence—drunkenness swinging the pendulum to one apex while prohibition carries it to the heights of the other. Temperance, therefore, should be the avenue we should travel in approaching this great and momentous problem that confronts our country. [Applause.]

The materia medica classifies alcohol in the following five groups:

First. Absolute alcohol, which is 97 per cent alcohol.

Second. Whisky, gin, rum, cognac, brandy, and rye contain between 45 and 49 per cent alcohol.

Third. The red wines, white wines, and champagne contain from 10 to 18 per cent alcohol.

Fourth. The stouts, ales, and porters contain from 4 to 6½ per cent alcohol.

Fifth. Beer contains from 1 to 3 per cent alcohol.

The 97 per cent or absolute alcohol is used in the elaboration, perfection, and development of most of the medicinal drugs which are utilized by doctors and pharmacists in dispensing medicine.

There is not a dry Member in this House who does not use alcohol every time he takes his physician's prescription to allay his sufferings, because most of the drugs and herbs used in pharmaceutical preparations can not be dissolved in any other media but alcohol. So I repeat, there is not a dry Member of this House, or his family, who does not use alcohol when he takes medicine.

Prior to prohibition the Government of the United States imposed a tax on pure alcohol and a very small tax on industrial alcohol. Into this industrial alcohol used for commercial purposes, the Government placed various chemical ingredients such as kerosene, quinine, creosote, pyridyne, formaldehyde, bichloride of mercury, wood alcohol, and countless other poisonous substances so that this industrial alcohol might not compete with the tax-paid pure alcohol.

Since prohibition has come into being 60,000,000 gallons of industrial alcohol are presumed to be used annually for commercial purposes, 6,000,000 of which, however, are diverted and converted by unscrupulous bootleggers to the clandestine purveyors of bootleg whisky. It is this industrial alcohol poisoned by the Government that has sent thousands of our unfortunate American citizens to an early and unsuspected grave.

Shall we have our Government act as a Lucretia Borgia of medieval days, who poisoned all who came into intimate contact with her? Shall we in this twentieth century—this civilized twentieth century—turn back to medieval times and leave to posterity the infamous heritage of the Borgias? I for one am irrevocably opposed to the country I love committing murder. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, how much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes have been consumed for the amendment and 25 minutes against the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. And if he gets unanimous consent, does that add to the hour?

The CHAIRMAN. It comes out of the hour.

Mr. BLANTON. How much time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. For the amendment 10 minutes are left, and against the amendment 15 minutes.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, it is this 6,000,000 gallons of diverted and converted industrial poisoned alcohol that finds its way to human consumption and is responsible for the murder annually of 12,000 of our citizens. This frightful mortality of 12,000 has the added horror of the morbidity of those who become victims of alcoholic gastritis, cirrhosis of the liver, Bright's disease, optic neuritis, and blindness, which are all attributable to the poisonous substances contained in denatured alcohol.

Mr. Chairman, as long as the prohibition law is upon the statute books of our country I believe in its complete and rigid enforcement and will vote for any measure that will carry into effect that feature of our Constitution. [Applause.]

The question before the House is not whether one is in favor of prohibition or opposed to prohibition; not a question of temperance or intemperance; not a question of those who are honest in their views or those who are otherwise; but the fundamental and only question before the House is the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], whether the Government shall put into industrial alcohol obnoxious drugs to make it unpalatable, or to put poison in it that ultimately commits murder.

Personally, I am in favor of denaturing alcohol with such ingredients that will make it unpalatable; yes, even nauseating, for human consumption; but loving humanity as I do, especially those weak, who need the guidance and assistance of others, I plead with you Members of this historic body not to permit our country to become particeps criminis to a continuation of horrors that have come in the wake of governmental participation in the poisoning of denatured alcohol. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The amendment under consideration does not do anything.

Mr. SIROVICH. Read the amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have.

Mr. SIROVICH. So have I. In effect this amendment prohibits the use of toxic or poisonous drugs. There is no objection to drugs that would denature the alcohol so long as they are not injurious to the body, and my contention is that any drugs that are in there which are not injurious, from the standpoint of poisoning, may be safely used as a denaturant.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELLER. Is it not a fact that for the year 1926 Doctor Harris, the general commissioner of New York City, reported that in New York City alone there were 755 deaths due to alcoholic poison?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes; and I attended a few cases myself, and every newspaper in New York was opposed to the use of poison in denatured alcohol.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes; I will yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the distinguished gentleman from New York if it is not a fact that whisky, absolutely without poison in it, has killed thousands of people?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes; and it has saved thousands of people in cases of pneumonia and other diseases. It has perhaps saved more than it has killed. We do not object to the use of liquor, but to the abuse. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. The leading physicians of the United States do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. SIROVICH. I am in agreement with the leading physicians of the United States, and I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BLANTON. How about Doctor Mayo? He contends that it is not necessary at all.

Mr. SIROVICH. I can give you the names of equally eminent authorities. Prof Samuel Lambert, who was my dean at the College of Physicians and Surgeons at Columbia University, one of the most eminent authorities in the world, is one. He is as good a witness as Doctor Mayo as to the effects of alcohol. Doctor Mayo is a surgeon. Professor Lambert is a medical man. Alcohol is used more freely in medicine than in surgery.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it not better to go to the foundation of this proposition and repeal the amendment so as to prevent the outrageous conditions that exist at the present time?

Mr. SIROVICH. It is best to go to the foundation. But that is not the subject before the House, however. The subject here is to amend the law in order to prevent the Government from engaging in partnership with the people who poison this liquor.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would put an end to the partnership of the Government with bootleggers.

Mr. SIROVICH. So would I, and hope all of the Members of this House would——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. As I understand the gentleman's position, he opposes putting anything into industrial alcohol that can not easily be taken out of it?

Mr. SIROVICH. No; I do not oppose that which can be easily taken out, but there are certain poisons by which the Government is denaturing alcohol that can not be taken out and which is the main cause of the death of so many thousands. That is why I am in favor of taking the Government out of the business of poisoning its citizens. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Florida rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is mistaken when he states that Florida is a wetter State than New York. [Applause.] I would like to say to my friend from New York and to my colleagues that Florida is one of the old dry States. It is dry by State law. It is dry by national law. It has a citizenship which is for law and which is for order. I deny the statement that my State is a wet State in practice or a wet State in theory. It is a dry State under the prohibition law, as dry as the Sahara Desert. It is not a State that fosters lawlessness, but it is a State of law and a State of order, and a State where nullificationists do not exist; in Florida we believe in the majesty of the law and uphold the integrity of the Nation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida yields back four minutes.

Mr. PALMISANO rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I understand that, under the rulings, in order to offer my amendment and say a few remarks I must do so at this time. I want to speak on the subject of the amendment that I am going to introduce after the action of the committee on the amendment now pending before it, and at the outset I want to say that I am sorry to hear the statement from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], who said he would resort to anything in order to enforce the law—that is, the Volstead Act. I have endeavored since I have been a Member of Congress——

Mr. CRAMTON. I made no such statement. The gentleman appears to refer to me, since he speaks of the gentleman from Michigan. I have said nothing that could be distorted into such a statement.

Mr. PALMISANO. If I am mistaken, I apologize to the gentleman.

But, anyhow, the dry element seems to take the view that a man who gets up here and says something about the wet clause is a nullifier and a criminal in himself. I want to appeal to the dry Members of this House. I have introduced a resolution here and correspondence which I have had with the Prohibition Commissioner as to an investigation of the prohibition administrator of Maryland and the District of Columbia, and I have shown in that resolution that the prohibition administrator has sanctioned the blackjacking of citizens, has put on as an undercover man a man who has been convicted of the crime of robbery and had been sentenced to six years in the Maryland penitentiary, and when that man was arrested for carrying concealed deadly weapons and for assault with intent to kill, that criminal is defended by the United States district attorney for the district of Maryland.

I say to you, my friends, that we are all trying to get this question settled right. I say, let us eliminate the criminals who are employed to enforce this Volstead Act. Let us prevent the administrators of this law from paying a cent to a man who has been convicted of a crime, to men who have been indicted by the various States for committing felonies, or to a man who has two indictments for misdemeanor pending in any of the courts of the country. I say, when you do that the gentlemen who are professing to be dry will prove that they are sincere by eliminating an element that the Prohibition Department is using in order to enforce the law. No longer than the other day our commissioner, Doctor Doran, when he found that the agents were unable to pass the examination—what did he say? This applies to you, gentlemen. When any of us here, at the next session, who are unable to be reelected next November—would you say to the man who came back here in November or in the following March "that because you had not been reelected you were going to sell out or be unfaithful to your trust or oath of office"?

Of course, you will not, because no man who is honest, in the first instance, would dare to do anything after his defeat. But, that is not true of the prohibition agents if we believe what Doctor Doran says:

> You upset the whole force, that the men who had failed in the examination are selling out.

That they are a bunch of grafters, and I say if they are a bunch of grafters they had no right to be there and they have no right to be there now, whether they passed the examination or not.

So, my friends, I have been trying to be fair. I ask you to look at the resolution and correspondence which I introduced on January 17.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee it becomes my duty to recommend to this House from time to time the funds necessary to enforce the law. We are here to-day with a bill which carries funds in many places for law enforcement. The particular item pending before us, and which has excited the enmity of our friends from Maryland, is only one of the items in the bill for which money is expended to enforce the law.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] is a subterfuge. Why does he not move to repeal the Volstead Act, if he is in earnest? He might get some others to vote with him on that. He knows very well that any attempt on his part to repeal the law will be useless, so he tries, through a side issue, to embarrass the situation.

He is trying to make it impossible to spend the money proposed to be appropriated for the enforcement of the act. He wants to say that industrial alcohol, denatured, shall not be permitted to leave the warehouse. He wants it to leave the warehouse in its pristine purity, if it leaves at all. [Laughter.] He wants by indirection to do what he knows he could not do by direction.

There is no sense, no justice, and no decency in the attempt now being made to embarrass the administration in the enforcement of the law. [Applause.] The law is here, and here it will remain. The law will be enforced, irrespective of what Maryland may think about it. [Applause.] If he will come in with an act to repeal the prohibition act—I am a wet—I would probably vote for a legitimate motion to repeal, but never under any circumstances would I vote for any such subterfuge as he now proposes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from Illinois may probably have noted—or, at least, he will on the standing vote to follow—that while the speeches come from Maryland the vote will largely come from Tammany Hall, and may exhibit what we might expect in the way of enforcement under Al Smith. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. So, gentlemen of the committee and citizens of the country, we are obligated under our oaths to enforce the law, and while the law is on the statute books, if I have anything to say anywhere, either as a public official or as a private citizen, it will be in favor of that law enforcement.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Tammany Hall, I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], is a local organization in the city of New York. It has no application anywhere else in the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. So, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as we come to you from day to day with recommendations for the funds with which to carry on the Government and ask your support for the appropriation of these funds, we come to-day with other recommendations for other funds to enforce our laws, and we ask you in the name of law and order to vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAMTON and Mr. LINTHICUM) there were—ayes 39, noes 167.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 21, line 10, strike out "$12,729,140" and insert in lieu thereof "$75,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: On page 21, line 10, strike out the figures "$12,729,140" and insert in lieu thereof "$75,000,000."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, is all time exhausted on this paragraph and all amendments thereto?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment. On page 21, line 10, strike out "$12,729,140" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: On page 21, line 10, strike out the figures "$12,729,140" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

Mr. CAREW. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 182.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. LINTHICUM: At the end of line 15, page 22, insert: "Provided further, That no money herein appropriated for the enforcement of the national prohibition act shall be used in the preparation or issue of any permit for the removal or use of any industrial alcohol known to be denatured by any poisonous drug."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is the same amendment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; this is limited to any poisonous drug.

Mr. MADDEN. It is exactly the same thing.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; the other amendment included any material injurious to the human system, whereas this amendment is limited to any poisonous drug.

The CHAIRMAN. There seems to be some difference in the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that the amendment is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON and Mr. CRAMTON) there were—ayes 35, noes 184.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 22, line 6, after the word "thereby," insert the following: "Provided further, That no money herein appropriated for the enforcement of the national prohibition act shall be used to pay anyone who has been convicted of a crime prior to his appointment, nor one who has been indicted for committing a felony, nor anyone who has two indictments pending against him in any of the State or Federal courts within the United States."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PALMISANO) there were—ayes 31, noes 168.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read down to and including line 2 on page 26.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, while we are still on the subject of law enforcement I want to call the attention of the House to a news item which appeared to-day in the papers, reporting a protest which had been filed by the Rumanian minister against what he deemed a violation of his immunity.

My letter to the Secretary of State speaks for itself, and I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 14, 1928.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Items appearing in the public press would indicate that a formal protest has been lodged by the royal Rumanian ambassador to the effect that his diplomatic immunity was invaded and disregarded by the activities of certain prohibition agents in New York City. While I have on many occasions protested against the activities of prohibition enforcement officials, I want to take this opportunity to state that I have obtained the details of the incident of which the Rumanian ambassador protests and unhesitatingly state that the agents in this instance not only acted within the proper limits of their official duties but that not even by an extreme stretch of the imagination was any diplomatic immunity disregarded.

It seems that the prohibition officials have had a system of express shipments of liquor under observation. A package shipped from a certain firm in Philadelphia addressed to Mr. A. E. Norris, of 55 East Seventy-second Street, happened to be one of the packages under observation and investigation. It contained bottles of liquor, and it was properly seized at the time of delivery.

I have searched the precedents in vain and fail to find where diplomatic immunity is conferred on the father-in-law of an employee of a diplomatic representative of a foreign country.

I take this opportunity, however, to point out that the representative of the Rumanian Government is the last person in the world to protest in a case of this kind. If he is now seeking to protect American citizens and to extend extraterritorial rights and diplomatic immunity to the father-in-law of an alleged employee of his office, he is seeking to establish a precedent heretofore unknown in international law. May I recall that only recently an American citizen residing in Rumania representing American business, living peacefully and entirely within his rights under the treaty between the United States and Rumania was brutally assaulted while the Rumanian police officers looked on, because it was suspected that the wife of this American citizen was of the Hebrew faith. A representative of a nation which has all through its history so disregarded the rights of others, the rights of its own citizens to worship in accordance with their belief, is the last person in the world to complain of liquor shipped in violation of law to the father-in-law of one of its nationals is seized by United States Government officials in the performance of their duties.

Before any formal reply is given to the protest filed, I respectfully urge a careful investigation in order to give the agents of the Government an opportunity to state their side of the case.

I am, sir, respectfully yours,

F. LAGUARDIA.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I made some investigation of the question of diplomatic immunity three or four years ago and I found that clearly, both under our our law and under the international law, not only does the immunity not extend to employees and relatives of employees, as the gentleman has emphasized, but it also does not extend to every secretary and underling of the embassies and legations. It pertains to the representative quite strictly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In this case, as I state in my letter, the father-in-law is an American citizen and a resident of New York City. These shipments coming out from Philadelphia were part of the liquor which I stated about a month ago was coming direct from the ships to the choice trade, and all these shipments were under observation. One happened to go into this man's home, and I fail to find where the nationality of an alleged employee extends any diplomatic rights or immunities to a citizen father-in-law.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order in order to reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] made his statement probably a little too broad. In looking up the precedents and the holdings under international law with respect to diplomatic immunity, I find the better authority is in favor of extending it to every member of the official household of a diplomat. But I want to say if you look up the precedents you will find in no case has it ever been held that diplomatic immunity permits any diplomat to disobey the laws of the country to which he is attached. He is expected to obey the law of the country to which he is sent, and if he disobeys it, it has been the universal custom and the universal practice to notify his country that he is persona non grata, that his passports have been handed to him, and that he should be called home. This has been the practice almost universally with all civilized countries.

I want to say with regard to the proposition here in Washington, it is not ordinarily the diplomats of the big countries who violate the law. Most of them are from the small countries, and the smaller the country and the rank of the diplomat the greater you will find his violations of law here in Washington. This is ordinarily the case here with respect to violators, although the representatives of most small countries obey our laws. I want to say that some of them, however, have absolutely disregarded the traffic laws of the District of Columbia. When they know it is against the law to run by street cars when they have stopped to discharge passengers, they deliberately run by them. When they know it is against the law to speed down some of our main streets like Sixteenth Street at 40 miles an hour, they have done this in disregard of the law and when stopped by officers they have cursed them and abused them. When they know it is against the law of the District of Columbia and of this Nation for anyone under 16 years of age to drive an automobile in the city of Washington, they have let young boys, even as young as 14 years of age, drive down the street and negligent homicide has resulted in at least one case recently.

I want to say they are persona non grata in the country to which they are attached when they disobey and disregard its laws, and they ought to have their passports handed to them, and I hope Mr. Secretary Kellogg in the future, when a complaint is made to him by the officials of the District of Columbia that diplomats stationed here in Washington and accredited to this country from foreign countries disobey and disregard our laws, will not call the officers who found them disobeying the law and admonish them or cause them to be admonished that they must not so interfere in the future, as has been done in some cases. I hope in each case he will let the country know that their passports have been handed to them and that he will ask to have them recalled.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER. How do these diplomats get these choice brandies and liquors into this country?

Mr. BLANTON. They ship them here. The gentleman knows how they get them here. They ship them here, and the gentleman knows when they dispense them here—and they have been dispensed by footmen and by butlers and by underlings—or when they are sold here in violation of the law in the Nation's Capital, they ought to be sent back home.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. A diplomat can bring it in in his own baggage with him, but a diplomat has no more right to make a shipment of liquor into the United States than any citizen.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly he has not, but he ships it in just the same. He has no right to dispense liquor here. We have nothing to do with what he puts on his own table; we have nothing to do with what he wears; we have nothing to do with what goes on lawfully in his embassy, but we do have something to do with what he does in such embassy in violation of our laws, and what he does on the streets of our Capital, and when an underling dispenses liquor in violation of law he ought to be called to account. Every country will uphold us in sending him back home.

Mr. SCHAFER. If we permit the diplomat to bring liquor in here in his baggage, why should we not permit the workingman to have 2½ per cent beer?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman is talking now for Wisconsin. [Laughter.] I was talking for our whole Nation.

Mr. SCHAFER. The man that wears a uniform on his back in a department is no better than the man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow.

Mr. BLANTON. I quite agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin. But both ought to obey the law. I have a resolution now pending before Congress to require our State Department to hand passports to all diplomats accredited to this country who wilfully and deliberately disobey our laws.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the matter discussed by the gentleman from Texas, in order that I may refresh my recollection and consult my files, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. The privileges of diplomatic immunity are stretched to fantastic and unwarranted lengths in practice. In this country such immunity must rest upon its recognition in our statutes, sections 4062 to 4066, Revised Statutes of the United States. These are found in sections 251 to 255 of title 22, United States Code.

I made some study of this question five years ago in connection with the public display of liquors at that time by certain embassies and legations. Anyone interested in the subject will find in my discussion, on pages 3789 and following of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 64, February 16, 1923, data from the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Treasury.

The immunity only extends to "the person of any ambassador or public minister of any foreign prince or state, authorized and received as such by the President, or any domestic or domestic servant of any such minister." It protects such person from arrest or imprisonment, and his goods and chattels from distraint, seizure, or attachment—United States Code, page 252. But such domestic servant is not protected unless—

> The name of the servant has, before the issuing thereof, been registered in the Department of State and transmitted by the Secretary of State to the marshal of the District of Columbia, who shall upon receipt thereof post the same in some public place in his office. (U. S. C. 254.)

There is nothing to cover the great number of secretaries, stenographers, and fathers in law. Only the minister or ambassador and such servants as are registered and posted are entitled to the immunity.

As to the use of liquor on the premises of legations and embassies we can not interfere, by reason of their extraterritoriality.

They have under the Constitution no right to import it into this country or transport it here. A common carrier or a private carrier transporting liquor for them is subject to the same penalties as for unlawful transportation for any other person. The Treasury regulations set forth in my remarks above referred to contemplate that shipments for the diplomats should not be received through the customs without examination, but that it should be sufficient, so far as examination is concerned, to accept a statement of the diplomat as to whether or not the shipment contained liquors.

In practice secretaries have been accorded the immunity, and the greater part of the trouble comes from them. The humor underlying the official disposal of such a case by Charles E. Hughes when Secretary of State is interesting. In the case of the secretary of the Polish Legation the Secretary of State wrote the following letter to Dr. Ladislas Wroblewski, then minister of Poland resident here, in which in one brief letter he expressed his regret for the invasion of the customary immunity in that case, and "improved this opportunity" to inform the minister that—

> Mr. Sokolowski appears to have had in his possession a quantity of alcoholic beverages greatly in excess of that which the privileges and immunities which are enjoyed by diplomatic representatives resident in this country would justify—

And—

> I understand * * * Mr. Sokolowski has been transferred to Warsaw.

The letter follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
January 26, 1924.

The department has addressed the following communication to Dr. Ladislas Wroblewski, minister of Poland:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 25, 1924.

SIR: With reference to your note of December 22, 1923, concerning the violation of the domicile of Mr. Venceslas Sokolowski, secretary of your legation, on December 20 last, and to subsequent conversations on this subject between you and an official of this department, I beg to transmit herewith a copy of a communication addressed to me from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, dated January 23, in relation thereto.

You will observe therefrom that the fact that the third floor of the premises was occupied or leased by Dr. Venceslas Sokolowski was unknown to the officers at the time the search was made; that if they had known of his status the apartment would not have been entered, and that it is regretted that such entry was made. I assure you that I share in the expression of regret that the immunity customarily enjoyed by all diplomatic officers should not have been observed in this instance.

I am constrained, however, to improve this opportunity to inform you that, according to the facts that have been developed in this connection, Mr. Sokolowski appears to have had in his possession a quantity of alcoholic beverages greatly in excess of that which the privileges and immunities in this regard, which are enjoyed by diplomatic representatives resident in this country, would justify. It has, therefore, been a matter of concern that this diplomatic immunity has been abused. I understand, from information with which you have been so good as to furnish the department, that Mr. Sokolowski has been transferred to Warsaw.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completion of the survey of the salt-marsh areas of the South Atlantic and Gulf States, to determine the exact character of the breeding places of the salt-marsh mosquitoes, in order that a definite idea may be formed as to the best methods of controlling the breeding of such mosquitoes, $10,000, to be expended by the Public Health Service in cooperation with the Bureau of Entomology of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 14, strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert "$15,000."

Mr. MADDEN. The committee accepts that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For incidental and contingent expenses, including new machinery and repairs, cases and enameling for medals manufactured, net wastage in melting and refining and in coining departments, loss on sale of sweeps arising from the treatment of bullion and the manufacture of coins, and not exceeding $1,000 in value of specimen coins and ores for the cabinet of the mint at Philadelphia, $273,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended for expenses of the annual assay commission.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 36, strike out the proviso in lines 21, 22, and 23, and in line 19, after the word "coins," insert the following: "not to exceed $500 for expenses of the annual assay commission."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any appropriation herein made toward the combined purpose of acquiring land and starting construction shall not be construed to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from contracting for the necessary land in an amount in excess of such appropriation if, in his judgment, a balance will remain in the limit of cost sufficient to cover complete construction of the building.

COAST GUARD STATION, GRAND MARAIS, MINN.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of sincerely thanking the Committee on Appropriations and the membership of the House for their favorable consideration of an item in the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill, which appears on page 26.

The item to which I refer provides for construction of a Coast Guard station at Grand Marais, Minn., on the north shore of Lake Superior, about halfway between Duluth, Minn., and the international border.

I introduced a bill in the Sixty-sixth Congress, which was enacted, authorizing the establishment of this station, and in the past three years have appeared before the Bureau of the Budget and the Appropriations Committee in an attempt to secure the necessary funds for construction. While it has required some time to accomplish results, it has been well worth the effort to have finally succeeded in securing the approval of the committee and the House.

Admiral F. C. Billard, commandant of the United States Coast Guard, has rendered valuable assistance through his active and enthusiastic cooperation. He appeared before the Bureau of the Budget on different occasions, urged the establishment of this station, and requested that the unused balance to the credit of the United States Coast Guard be applied to this project. I want to pay my compliments to this capable and humane public official, and to the personnel of the United States Coast Guard in general for the very efficient manner in which they discharge the duties imposed upon them in the saving of human life in times of shipwreck and disaster.

The need for this station is very urgent. Grand Marais has a natural land-locked harbor, affording shelter for vessels that put in at that point to weather the storms. It is also a port from which considerable quantities of gravel, pulpwood, and other forest products are shipped. In addition to the traffic which originates at Grand Marais, many vessels pass this point during the season of navigation on the Great Lakes.

In the summer of 1926, 11,445 boats entered and cleared from the ports of Duluth, Minn., and Superior, Wis. Much of this traffic passes close to the dangerous, rocky coast and islands that lie near Grand Marais, and, Mr. Chairman, I shudder to think of the terrible fatalities which might occur should some of our large passenger boats go aground in a storm on the reefs or shoals. The life-saving station nearest to Grand Marais is 105 miles across Lake Superior, too great a distance to render effective assistance to boats stranded on the north shore.

The question of establishing a Coast Guard station at Grand Marais, Minn., was taken up with Hon. Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, who approved the project as a safeguard to navigation, but, Mr. Chairman, the most compelling reason which has prompted me to attempt to secure the construction of this station is the need of the sturdy, courageous fishermen, who go out upon Lake Superior to ply their trade in the winter season when the temperature frequently reaches 40 degrees below zero and sometimes lower. These men are engaged in herring fishing. The herring usually begin their run about September 15 and continue to frequent the shores until about February 15. During the winter season the ice field on the lake frequently extends from 90 to 100 miles out from the Bay of St. Louis into Lake Superior, but due to the prevalence of strong north winds the ice is driven away from the north shore, leaving a space of open water from one-half mile to 5 or 6 miles in width. It is in this strip of open water the fishermen set their nets and ply their trade.

These men are frequently caught, while out attending to their nets, by sudden off-shore storms, are blown to sea, and often perish from cold or exhaustion. Some have perished within sight of their loved ones, who were unable to render assistance because of the lack of proper equipment. These fishermen live with their families in the little hamlets sheltered under the majestic cliffs of the north shore. Oftentimes the wives of the fishermen accompany their husbands to assist them in earning a livelihood for their dependents. Some of these women have also perished.

It is on behalf of these men and their dependents—these honest toilers who brave the storms in order that others may be provided with luxuries—for the Lake Superior fish are a real luxury—these people, who lead such obscure lives that their welfare is often overlooked; it is on behalf of these people that I wish to thank the Members of the House and committee for this appropriation necessary to establish this station. In years to come, Mr. Speaker, who knows what a great work for humanity may have resulted through our action here to-day, and I am grateful it has been my privilege to have served with the membership of the House which has to-day approved this project. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the committee made a very careful study of the problem mentioned by the gentleman from Minnesota. It has real merit for it affects the lives of numbers of people who are jeopardized on many occasions. This is the only life-saving station for many miles along that coast, and the north coast of Lake Superior is not a very smooth place in a storm. We were anxious to follow the advice of the gentleman from Minnesota and have recommended the appropriation for the station. We hope, now, with this money, they will proceed rapidly to construct the station, put in the equipment that is provided, and furnish the facilities to protect the lives of these people.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CARSS], who is one of our most valuable legislators here, needs special commendation, for I understand that this is the first money that that part of Minnesota has been able to get out of the Committee on Appropriations for 30 years.

Mr. MADDEN. He has been very persuasive. We looked into the merits of the case and were convinced that he knew what he was talking about, and we are glad to cooperate with him. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. TILSON having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MICHENER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10635, the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] whether it is his purpose to continue with this bill to-morrow?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I hope so. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday business, in order to-morrow, be dispensed with and that we may proceed with this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have been informed, and, I am sure, authentically, that the committee which would have the call to-morrow, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is agreed practically by its entire membership that they do not care to go forward with their business.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], chairman of that committee, told me that he is not ready and will be glad to have Calendar Wednesday business dispensed with to-morrow.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That has been my understanding. There is no committee demanding the time, and under the circumstances I see no reason to object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it may be true that the committee which has the call to-morrow is not ready, and yet the custom is to call the roll of committees. Every session we are confronted with a situation where in the last day of the session or the day before the last day of the session there is presented the first opportunity that the Veterans' Committee has to come in with its bills. The Veterans' Committee has one or two important bills which it has reported and which the House is ready and anxious to consider. Besides, there is a constitutional amendment in respect to the lame-duck Congress that has been reported and that is on the calendar and ready.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In regard to the constitutional amendment, a special rule has been authorized from the Committee on Rules as far as the White amendment is concerned, and I think the gentleman from New York will agree that a constitutional amendment ought not to be called up on Calendar Wednesday, when the time for debate is entirely too restricted. There ought not to be cloture of debate on a constitutional amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me say further in regard to the observation made by the gentleman from New York in respect to the other committees, of course I get my information touching these matters of proposed procedure primarily from the majority floor leader. I feel quite sure that there are no other committees that do want to go on to-morrow. I think it proper to say, however, that it will hardly lie within the mouths of the chairmen of these various committees along toward the end of the session to come in and complain that they did not have an opportunity to be heard if they do not come here now upon occasions of this kind and object. So far as I am concerned, I feel no responsibility in connection with it and do not feel that my side has any responsibility in connection with it. Therefore I interpose no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The mere fact that the chairmen of the committees do not object is not very comforting to some of us who are very anxious to get consideration of certain legislation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have always recognized the right of the majority party to fix the order of business, unless there is some extraordinary condition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN BRIDGE BILLS

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, there are upon the Speaker's table certain Senate bills which I wish to have taken from the Speaker's table and indefinitely postponed. They are—

S. 760. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Ashland Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River;

S. 2257. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct a bridge across the Coosa River near Wetumpka, Elmore County, Ala.; and

S. 2666. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Madison Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DENISON. I ask unanimous consent to take these bills from the Speaker's table and indefinitely postpone their consideration, the reason being that similar bills have passed the House and have gone to the Senate and have been passed by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call up the following Senate bills from the Speaker's table and take the same action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate bills referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 820. An act granting the consent of Congress to R. A. Breuer, H. L. Stolte, John M. Schermann, O. F. Nienhueser, Charles A. Egley, and George C. Eberlin, their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Hermann, Gasconade County, Mo.;

S. 821. An act granting the consent of Congress to O. F. Schulte, E. H. Otto, O. W. Arcularius, J. L. Calvin, and J. H. Dickbrader, their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Washington, Franklin County, Mo.;

S. 2188. An act granting the consent of Congress to Frank M. Burruss, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Miami, Saline County, Mo.;

S. 2189. An act granting the consent of Congress to F. C. Barnhill, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Arrow Rock, Saline County, Mo.;

S. 2476. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River on the Lafayette-Celina road in Clay County, Tenn.;

S. 2477. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Clinch River on the Sneedville-Rogersville road in Hancock County, Tenn.;

S. 2479. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River on the Jasper-Chattanooga road in Marion County, Tenn.;

S. 2478. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River on the Decatur-Kingston road in Roane County, Tenn.;

S. 2480. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River on the Knoxville-Maryville road in Knox County, Tenn.;

S. 2730. An act authorizing the city of Louisville, Ky., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near said city;

S. 1879. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Interstate Bridge Co., of Lansing, Iowa, to construct a bridge across the Missouri River at Lansing;

S. 2490. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Tennessee to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River on the Paris-Dover road in Henry and Stewart Counties, Tenn.; and

S. 1162. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Sistersville Ohio River Bridge Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a toll bridge across the Ohio River at Sistersville, Tyler County, W. Va.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, in this connection I would like to say that bills similar to all these Senate bills have passed the House and are now pending in the Senate. The House bills were in proper form. The Senate bills are not in proper form, and it would be necessary to have them referred to our committee and be amended. The authors of these bills have told me that they would prefer the passage of the House bills, and, therefore, in view of that situation, I ask unanimous consent that these bills be taken from the Speaker's table and indefinitely postponed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker—I shall not object—but there has been a habit growing up in another body where in a situation like this we send over House bills, and all after the enacting clause of the House bill is stricken out and the Senate bill is incorporated, and the bill is passed as a Senate bill. That custom has grown up. I understand that this request that the gentleman from Illinois is making will force another body, through courtesy, to pass House bills, if any are passed at all.

Mr. MADDEN. That would not be a bad idea.

Mr. BLANTON. It being a question of courtesy, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, in this connection I would like to state that it is not the best practice for Members, who introduce bills of this kind in the House, to go over to the Senate and have similar bills introduced there. It does not expedite business. Very often the bills pass each other on their way across, and produce complications. I think it will expedite the consideration of business of this kind to just introduce the bill in the House and let it await its turn in the Senate, because we are expediting these bills as rapidly as possible here, and it will save time and work to allow the House bills to be considered by the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It duplicates the work. I think we passed 70 bills one day, and 34 of those bills passed the Senate on the same day, and of course one or other body has to do this work over again.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I want to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENISON. There is a Senate bill on the Speaker's table, S. 2348. A similar bill has passed the House and gone to the Senate. Of course, I am familiar with the rule that when a Senate bill is on the Speaker's table, and a similar bill has been reported here and is on the calendar, it is in order to consider the Senate bill. Does the same rule apply where the House bill has passed the House and been messaged over to the Senate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sees no reason why this should change the rule.

Mr. DENISON. It seems that the reason for the rule would apply.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that my first reaction to the thought is that it would change the rule. The rule now is simply one of convenience and in order to expedite business. Now it does not necessarily expedite business for a gentleman to call this bill up in the absence of the House bill. Suppose the Senate would take the House bill and amend it and send it back to us. It seems to me the best course would be for the gentleman to make a motion requesting the return of the House bill.

Mr. DENISON. I thought of that, but I thought this would be the quickest way to dispose of it. The Senate bill is in reality in the form we desire to pass it. It was my intention to amend the House bill when it was before the House, but by an oversight I neglected to do so. Then I went over and suggested to the Senate committee that they amend the Senate bill in the manner desired, which they did. The Senate bill has been amended and is now on the Speaker's table in proper form, whereas the House bill will have to be amended by the Senate committee before it can be considered by the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then we really have nothing on our calendar at all on the subject?

Mr. DENISON. No; the House has been passed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me suggest that the House itself might disagree with the gentleman's personal views with reference to the amendment in question.

Mr. DENISON. They are not my personal views but the committee's views.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then the House might disagree with the committee's views.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Complications might arise, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee. The gentleman has the Senate bill and is thinking of having it passed. The similar House bill is over in the Senate. Of course, if the House bill were on the Calendar, you could dispose of it, but the gentleman does not know but what some Senator has the floor over there right now seeking to pass the House bill, and if we should pass both of them unamended, they would both go to the President. I think there is quite a difference in the situation which the gentleman presents and that under which a Senate bill can be called up as a matter of right when a similar House bill is on the calendar.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, regardless of the theory and purpose of the rule, is it not a pretty free interpretation of the rule to hold that a bill which has already passed the House comes under the rule, because the rule provides that a bill must be reported by a House committee and be on the House Calendar? It is not on the House Calendar after it goes to the Senate.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the bill was reported by the House committee and was on the House Calendar.

Mr. MAPES. It was, but it is not now.

Mr. DENISON. No; it is not now, and that is the reason I propounded the inquiry. I was not sure about the application of the rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We have not the House bill here at all. Of course, the gentleman from Illinois will understand that I am discussing the parliamentary question, and there is no reflection intended. We have not any way officially to know that the House bill and the Senate bill are the same. I repeat to the gentleman that I am discussing the parliamentary situation, and casting no reflection upon the statement made by the gentleman that they are the same, or substantially the same; but the more I think of it the more I am impressed with the idea that we could not afford to set the precedent of holding that a bill which has in fact passed the House and is physically away from the House occupies precisely the same parliamentary status as one that is reported from a committee and is on the calendar under the terms of that rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would like to read the paragraph of the rule which seems to apply, and beyond this he can find nothing that does apply.

House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in a Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine, as may also Senate bills substantially the same as House bills already favorably reported by a committee of the House.

This is all the Chair can find in the rules that directly applies to this situation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me add:

And not required to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

It refers only to House bills and not bills on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes; it applies to House Calendar bills only.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the Chair kindly give the rule from which he has just read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is Rule XXIV, paragraph 2.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that while I may be wrong I seem to recall that this matter has been decided within the last year or two, when it was held that when a bill had left the House and gone to the Senate it did not come within this rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The precedent to which the gentleman refers has not been called to the attention of the Chair.

Mr. DENISON. Nor to mine; and I do not remember such a question having arisen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not aware of the existence of such a precedent and would like to have the gentleman cite it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not like to rely altogether on my recollection, of course, but I do seem to recall some such ruling.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In order that no new precedent may be established here unnecessarily, let the Chair suggest that in the absence of necessity for haste it would be well for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] to withhold his request until to-morrow.

Mr. DENISON. I will say to the Chair that there is no haste in connection with this matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair will suggest that the gentleman withhold his request until to-morrow in order to give time to look up the decisions interpreting the rule.

Mr. DENISON. I will be glad to let the matter go over until to-morrow. But in that connection let me suggest to the Chair that the rule does not say that this rule applies where a bill substantially similar has been reported by a House committee and is on the House Calendar; it says simply when a bill substantially similar has been reported by a committee of the House. That is the case here, although, as a matter of fact, it has been passed by the House. I have raised the question, Mr. Speaker, because I can see that this question is likely to arise often, and I am anxious to learn the best way to expedite the business in accordance with the Rules of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes. My own thought about it is that clearly it must mean that the House bill is yet within the control of the House. In this instance we are not in physical possession of the bill. It has already passed the House and gone away from us.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me suggest also that the term "bill" refers generally to matters actually pending in the House. Is the bill in the House after it has been sent to the Senate, or is it a "House bill" after it has been passed by the House and sent to the Senate?

Mr. DENISON. I do not know what else it would be.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is an "act" so far as the House is concerned. The Senate gives the bill the title of an "act" when it comes there after passage in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The further discussion of the matter inclines the Chair even more to the belief that this is a matter that should go over.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition for the purpose of asking the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman may propound his question.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Do I understand that the gentleman from New York was seeking to convey the thought that the chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Legislation will not take advantage of Calendar Wednesday and——

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman ought to get that information second hand.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana (continuing). And call up legislation that is within the control of that committee.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman's committee has not the call.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman was simply seeking to anticipate the time when the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation would be called.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I understand the gentleman intimated there were a number of the members of that committee who desired to have legislation considered, and I was under the impression that the gentleman conveyed the thought that there were members of the committee who were willing and anxious to have bills considered but that the chairman of that committee, apparently, was indisposed to take advantage of the call.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows that the committees are called in their order of standing and that the more Calendar Wednesdays we dispense with the less opportunity there is that a committee at the end of the list will be called.

Mr. MAPES and Mr. BLANTON rose.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me far-fetched to try to bring the chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation into this Calendar Wednesday proposition at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Louisiana has two minutes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. McSWAIN. For permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MAPES. Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. Did not the gentleman from Louisiana have some time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman did not. It was all by unanimous consent and the regular order has been demanded.

Mr. MAPES. I understood the gentleman to ask for two minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I asked the question in an effort to honestly and sincerely get the information.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. It was not my desire, Mr. Speaker, to reflect upon the chairman of the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes in view of the situation that has developed.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me rather far-fetched to try to bring the chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation into this discussion with respect to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday. His is one of the very last committees to be authorized by the rules and we are only starting the call of the calendar of committees now. The Banking and Currency Committee is the committee actually having the call. The next committee is the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures and the next committee is the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is anxious not to lose its day, and to jump way down to the end of the list of committees and try to charge the chairman of a committee near the end of the call with responsibility of dispensing with Calendar Wednesday it seems to me is rather far-fetched.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Regular order is demanded. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. McSWAIN. For the purpose of presenting a unanimous-consent request that I be permitted to extend my remarks in order to explain a bill which I have introduced to-day doing tardy justice to the original and pioneer aviators of the United States Army.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

JUSTICE TO PIONEER AVIATORS—RELATING TO NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the bill introduced by me "to provide proper recognition for the early pioneers in Army aviation," it is proposed in the first section that those officers of the Army who qualified on or before December 31, 1913, as military aviators, shall receive 75 per cent additional pay for flying as has heretofore been twice provided in bills passed by Congress, and that, of course, this extra pay shall accrue only for periods during which they participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights.

There were 24 of these officers who qualified as military aviators during this early period; that is, prior to December, 1913. Eleven other officers detailed to flying activities during this same period were killed. Of this total of 35, 2 have transferred to other branches, 5 are retired, only 7 remain active in the Air Corps, and 21 are dead. It is thus seen that but seven officers remain in the Air Corps to participate in the benefits of this section. One of these officers now receives 75 per cent additional pay—under the provisions of section 127a, national defense act—because the rating of military aviator was conferred upon him for having specially distinguished himself in time of war in active operations against the enemy. Another of these seven officers has been found physically disqualified and is not on flying duty. Thus this provision would to-day affect but five officers and entail an additional cost to the Government of only $517.70 monthly.

These men were the early pioneers in Army aviation and were responsible for developments which made flying in subsequent years from ten to forty times safer. They have all qualified a second time as military aviators under the laws of Congress passed June 3, 1916, and July 24, 1917.

By section 2 it is proposed to permit these early pioneers in Army aviation to retire at any time subsequent to the passage of the act. This is not without precedent, for in an act of the Sixty-third Congress, approved March 4, 1915, copy attached, certain officers of the Army and Navy who had been engaged in work on the construction of the Panama Canal were permitted to retire at any time after the passage of that act.

This is a very just provision, for these officers who have survived have lived their lives many times over in the hazardous early days of flying when a fatality occurred for approximately every hundred flying hours. Subsequent to that period all of these officers have held positions of great trust and responsibility and contributed much to the development and organization of the present air forces of the country.

This section will apply to a maximum of 9 officers, 7 who are now active in the Air Corps and 2 who were transferred to other branches of the service. All of these officers have had over 20 years' service and there is no doubt that the services they gave during the early days of flying should count many times over and make them eligible for retirement.

Section 3 of the bill proposes that the retired pay of these officers shall be 75 per cent of all pay and allowances, including flying pay, of the grade in which retired. There are five of this group of officers now on the retired list and possibly nine others will become eligible to participate in the benefits of this provision if they live to retire. This makes an absolute maximum of 14 officers, or but 40 per cent of the total number of 35 who started the early air activities in the Army and were responsible for its early development. The casualty rate was high. The strain, mental and physical, was great; but these officers persisted in spite of the chances against them because they realized that here was a new weapon for national defense which required development. Some of those who are now retired suffered accidents which contributed to their physical unfitness. One officer was picked up for dead and was being taken to the undertaker's when somebody discovered a sign of life. He was completely broken up, but managed to survive and was placed on the retired list.

Medical officers familiar with the hazards of flying believe the subconscious strain on the physical system due to the ever-present risk in military flying causes officers to use up their physical resistance very much faster than in other walks of life. How much more so was this the case when flying was only one-thirtieth to one-fortieth as safe as it is to-day! Therefore, it would appear that this is but a just recognition of the services that these early pioneers rendered.

It is impracticable to compute the cost of this provision because it varies with the grade and length of service of the officer affected. It is obvious, however, that the cost will be trifling compared with the services rendered. Applied to the officers on the retired list to-day, it will amount to but $717.19 per month.

The last section of the bill is designed to prevent any retroactive effect as such an action is believed contrary to the policy of Congress.

The justice of this proposed legislation is fully appreciated when the early history of Army flying is known. With little more than box kites to fly in, with casualties occurring on every hand, with appropriations so meager that often the officers themselves supplied the funds to maintain the equipment, with equipment so frail as to be a constant menace to the safety of the flyer and with little known of aerodynamics, these early pioneers had almost insurmountable obstacles with which to contend. One purchase of six "military" planes took six lives. A death occurred for approximately every hundred flying hours. Those who survived and passed the tests not only were announced in War Department orders as having qualified as military aviators, but they again qualified under subsequent laws of Congress and received the pay which it is now designed by the provisions of this bill to restore to them. They not only flew under extremely hazardous conditions but were responsible for the development of many characteristics considered highly desirable in military airplanes. So far as known, no material recognition has ever been given them.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LEAVITT, for two days, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois withhold his motion to adjourn?

Mr. MADDEN. I withhold it.

PROHIBITION AGENTS, ADMINISTRATORS, ETC.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight to-morrow to file minority views on the resolution H. Res. 108.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I withhold the motion for that purpose.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the Members of the House that I have not the slightest or remotest desire to reflect on the alertness or vigilance of the chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, for whom I entertain the warmest sort of friendship; and it is not entirely, in my judgment, in keeping with the situation that prompts one of the Members here to rise for the purpose of honestly securing information, to be distorted by another Member and made to appear as if his attitude were unfriendly and hostile to a man for whom he has the warmest friendship. I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] and I have the same thought, and that is to refute any inference that might be made that the chairman of the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee has been derelict in any way. I did not ask my question with any idea of reflecting upon the vigilance of the chairman of that committee.

Mr. MAPES rose.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. So far as I am concerned, I had no intention of misinterpreting the gentleman's inquiry, and I accept what he says in perfect good faith.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask one of the gentlemen a question? In view of the experience which we have had in regard to veterans' legislation covering the last six years at least, does not the gentleman think we are wasting a good deal of time in even discussing Calendar Wednesday for the legislation of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, because they have never functioned except under suspension of the rules?

Mr. BLANTON. That is exactly what I wanted to bring out. Since the committee was organized four years ago, they have never brought in a bill except under a suspension of the rules, where you could not amend it in any particular, and the rules allowed only 20 minutes to the side for debate.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED

Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table, and, under the rule, referred to the appropriate committee, as follows:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry Joint Resolution 2 of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, which is entitled "Assembly joint resolution memorializing the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States to continue in effect his Federal quarantine against importation into the United States of livestock and livestock products from foreign countries where foot-and-mouth disease is known to exist."

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Assembly Joint Resolution 2 (Mr. Winter), memorializing the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States to continue in effect his Federal quarantine against importation into the United States of livestock and livestock products from foreign countries where foot-and-mouth disease is known to exist

[Approved February 3, 1928]

Whereas reports are being circulated that the present Federal Government quarantine against importation to the United States of livestock, meats, hides, and similar livestock products from foreign countries where foot-and-mouth disease is known to exist may be abolished or modified; and

Whereas foot-and-mouth disease is known to be one of the most destructive of the contagious and infectious diseases affecting livestock, its appearance in this country, based upon past experience, not only causing terrific losses of livestock, but requiring control measures necessitating drastic restriction of movement of all kinds of commerce in the areas affected as well as large expenditure of public funds: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of Nevada, That we indorse and approve the action of the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States in establishing the aforesaid quarantine and most strongly urge upon him the necessity and desirability of its continuance in force against all foreign countries where foot-and-mouth disease exists; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution, duly authenticated by the proper officials of the State of Nevada, be sent to the Hon. W. M. Jardine, Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, and to each Member of the Nevada delegation in the Congress of the United States.

MORLEY GRISWOLD,
President of the Senate.
V. R. MERIALDO,
Secretary of the Senate.
DOUG H. TANDY,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN W. WRIGHT,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

STATE OF NEVADA,
Department of State, ss:

I, W. G. Greathouse, the duly elected, qualified, and acting secretary of state of the State of Nevada, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true, full, and correct copy of the original Assembly Joint Resolution No. 2, introduced by Mr. Winter, approved February 3, 1928, now on file and of record in this office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of State at my office in Carson City, Nev., this 10th day of February, A. D. 1928.

[SEAL.]

W. G. GREATHOUSE,
Secretary of State.

Mr. PITTMAN. I also present and ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, Assembly Joint Resolution 1, of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, memorializing Congress relative to Federal aid for highway maintenance. A part of the resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of Nevada, That we respectfully memoralize and petition the Congress of the United States to give due consideration to enacting Federal aid for maintenance purposes on the same ratio as used for the basis of the present Federal aid road act.

I will state that I have introduced a bill in accordance with the resolution just presented, and it is now pending before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEVADA, DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
CARSON CITY, NEV.

Assembly Joint Resolution 1, memorializing Congress relative to Federal aid for highway maintenance, approved February 3, 1928

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Nevada, now assembled in a special session, is again confronted with the necessity of enacting suitable legislation to provide additional funds for the department of highways to be used in maintaining the State's 7 per cent highway system; and

Whereas the tremendous yearly increase in motor transportation is commanding more money each year for maintaining the roads to a standard meeting the requirements of the Federal Bureau of Public Roads; and

Whereas this ever-increasing cost of maintenance is becoming a heavy tax burden upon the people of the State of Nevada; and

Whereas the State of Nevada is the seventh largest State in the Union with 87.72 per cent of the total area untaxable Federal-owned land; and

Whereas the total population of the State is less than 80,000 people; and

Whereas it is of great importance to the State of Nevada and all western and public-land States a policy be developed which will insure Federal aid for the maintenance of the roads built under the Federal aid road act, and on the equitable ratio of public land to privately owned taxable land; and

Whereas the conditions prevailing in the State of Nevada also exist in most western and all public-land States: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of Nevada, That we respectfully memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States to give due consideration to enacting Federal aid for maintenance purposes on the same ratio as used for the basis of the present Federal aid road act; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the State of Nevada be, and is hereby, directed to forward a certified copy of this resolution by mail to each and every Member of Congress, to the Secretary of Agriculture, Chief Engineer of the Bureau of Public Roads, the American Automobile Association, the American Association of State Highway Officials, and to the governors and heads of the departments of highways of all western and public-land States.

MORLEY GRISWOLD,

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of State at my office in Carson City, Nev., this 7th day of February, A. D. 1928.

W. G. GREATHOUSE,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I present a letter in the nature of a petition from the Chamber of Commerce of Norwich, Conn., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Commerce Committee.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORWICH, CONN., February 9, 1928.

Senator HIRAM BINGHAM,
House of Senate, Congress of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Norwich Chamber of Commerce, acting through its legislative committee and board of directors, have authorized me to write you stating what action has been taken in regard to legislative affairs, as follows:

1. Merchant marine: The chamber is in accord with the national chamber's views in opposing the Jones bill, S. 744.

2. Federal taxation: Our committee, which considered United States Chamber referendum No. 50, was in favor of immediate reduction and repeals in Federal taxes. They were opposed 2 to 1 to the provision that the report of corporate income tax applicable to net income of 1927 should not exceed 10 per cent; and this committee was in favor of Congress providing full opportunity for the joint tax committee for the Federal tax laws and their administration.

3. Postal rates: The action in this matter was in favor of revision of present postal rates, as the chamber believes that the present postal rates are unscientific and a disappointment in production of revenue to the Government.

4. Mississippi flood control: Our chamber went on record as opposed to the Federal Government absorbing the entire expense of the flood control in the Mississippi Valley. It believes that a proportion of this expense should be borne by the States bordering on the lower Mississippi, as there is a direct benefit accruing to these States by such protection. They are, however, in favor of the Federal Government assuming sole responsibility for locating, constructing, and maintaining such works, and that there should be adequate appropriation to insure efficient, continuous, and economic work, and that the whole matter of flood control should be dealt with in legislation and administration upon its own merits, separate and distinct from any other undertaking.

5. Railroad consolidation: The committee is in favor of railroad consolidation and urges support to the Fess-Parker bill.

6. Bill H. R. 6523: The legislative committee and the board of directors are in favor of the passage of this bill, which seeks to increase the allowance of retired war veterans to $30 per month.

7. Swing-Johnson bill: The legislative committee and board of directors state that in their opinion the Government should let the public utilities alone.

Very truly yours,

NORWICH CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
WALTER H. PILCHER, Secretary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the East Greenbush (N. Y.) Grange, opposing any relaxation of immigration restrictions and favoring the prompt passage of legislation further restricting immigration from countries south of the Rio Grande River, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the New York State Federation of Women's Clubs, favoring the passage of the so-called McNary-Woodruff bill, providing for appropriations to be expended over a period of years for conserving the navigability of navigable rivers, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented petitions of members of the faculty and student body, of Colgate University, Hamilton, N. Y., favoring adoption of the so-called Capper resolution for the negotiation of treaties renouncing war as an instrument of public policy, and also the so-called Borah resolution for the formal outlawry of war, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

COTTON PRICES

Mr. DENEEN. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report favorably with an amendment Senate Resolution 142, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 142) submitted by Mr. SMITH February 8, 1928, was read, as follows:

Whereas the 1927 cotton crop is more than 4,000,000 bales less than the production of cotton in 1926; and

Whereas the consumption of American cotton is greater than ever before in the history of the cotton industry; and

Whereas the price of cotton has steadily declined from the time that it was ascertained that the crop would be extremely short; and

Whereas the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture stated in a bulletin issued by it that in spite of the short crop cotton prices would decline; and

Whereas from the date of issuance of such statement cotton prices have steadily declined; and

Whereas numerous petitions and memorials have come from different sources alleging manipulation of the cotton market: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and directed (1) to make a full and complete investigation of the activities of the cotton exchanges, cotton merchants, bankers, millmen, and the Department of Agriculture, with a view to determining whether there has been any manipulation of the market or any undue influence thereupon in connection with the issuance or publication of cotton reports or the decline in the price of cotton, and (2) to report thereon to the Senate as soon as practicable, with such recommendations for necessary legislation as it deems advisable. For the purposes of this resolution, such committee or subcommittee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of such stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of such committee or subcommittee, which shall not be in excess of $25,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. FRAZIER. I understand that the resolution proposes an investigation by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMITH. It does. The resolution was submitted by me a few days ago. It has just been favorably reported, and I hope we may have immediate action upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was, on page 3, line 3, after the words "excess of," to strike out "$25,000" and to insert "$5,000," so as to read:

The expenses of such committee or subcommittee, which shall not be in excess of $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE COLORADO RIVER

Mr. PITTMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3177) to improve the navigability of the Colorado River, to provide flood control, to aid in the reclamation of public lands of the United States, to prevent controversy between the States of the Colorado River Basin, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO ALIEN PROPERTY BILL

Mr. HOWELL submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 7201, the so-called alien property claims bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to House bill 7201, the so-called alien property claims bill, relative to certain Danish ships.

Section 19 of the bill as reported by the committee authorizes an award in respect of the taking by the United States of two ships belonging to German companies, which companies became, through the transfer of Schleswig-Holstein to Denmark in pursuance of the Versailles treaty, Danish companies. The section as reported requires a finding that all the German members of the company became citizens of some other country and remain non-German on the date of the passage of the bill. It is barely possible that a small portion of the interest in the company may be vested in Germans. The amendment substitutes for the limitation in the bill a requirement that no award can be made unless the company was organized under the law of Germany and became a company under the law of some other country, and that on the date of the enactment of this act at least 95 per cent of the interest in the company is owned by non-Germans.

I move that the amendment lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

STATISTICS RELATIVE TO UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent that it be read and lie over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 147), as follows:

Whereas it is essential to the intelligent conduct of private and public business enterprises, to the proper timing for the inauguration of public works by the Federal Government, and the encouragement of similar undertakings by the States, to the formulation of sound economic policy, and it is prerequisite to the provision of relief against the hardship of unemployment and to the ultimate solution of the unemployment that accurate and all-inclusive statistics of employment and unemployment be had at frequent intervals; and

Whereas it is apparent that the United States is now suffering from a decided growth of unemployment, and no nation-wide statistics of unemployment in the United States are anywhere available:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor is hereby directed (1) to investigate and compute the extent of unemployment in the United States and make report thereon to the Senate, and together therewith to report the methods and devices whereby the investigation and computation shall have been made; (2) to investigate the method whereby frequent periodic report of the number of unemployed in the United States and permanent statistics thereof may hereafter be had and made available, and make report thereon to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

EMPLOYMENT OF AMERICAN MERCHANT VESSELS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have here the quarterly report of the Shipping Board on the employment of merchant vessels of the United States. It contains some very valuable information, in view of the legislation now pending, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
BUREAU OF RESEARCH, DIVISION OF STATISTICS,
January 1, 1928.

QUARTERLY REPORT ON THE EMPLOYMENT OF AMERICAN MERCHANT VESSELS OF 1,000 GROSS TONS AND OVER JANUARY 1, 1928
(Does not include lake or river tonnage)

INTRODUCTORY

This report is compiled from the latest available information as to the employment or status of American-owned steam and motor merchant vessels of 1,000 gross tons and over engaged in or assigned to ocean trade.

Table I summarizes the status and employment of privately owned and Government-owned American passenger, general cargo, and tanker vessels which were engaged in foreign and coastwise trades or were laid up and out of active service on date of report.

Table II includes ships in passenger service and gives further detail as to ownership and trade segregations.

Tables III and IV make similar segregations of general cargo and tanker vessels, respectively.

Table V shows location of laid-up vessels.

Vessels operating in two or more trade services are assigned to the service in which the largest portion of operation was performed during the three months' period preceding the date of this report; i. e., coastwise vessels touching Canadian ports and intercoastal vessels touching Caribbean or Hawaiian ports, are included with coastwise and intercoastal vessels, respectively. Record of vessels sold by the Shipping Board to private owners for operation or for scrapping has been revised upon the basis of actual physical delivery, the tonnage delivered for scrapping being eliminated entirely from the record. Shipping Board vessels under bare-boat charter or assigned to managing operators for spot service have been included as Government-owned tonnage engaged in the services to which they are assigned.

HOW TO MAKE FRIENDS IN LATIN AMERICA

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from The State, a newspaper in Columbia, S. C., entitled "How to make friends in Latin America," which I ask may be published in the Appendix. I am informed that the editor of this newspaper, Mr. N. G. Gonzales, is a man of American lineage of several generations, and that The State is one of the most important newspapers in South Carolina.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The State, of Columbia, S. C., Sunday, February 12, 1928]

HOW TO MAKE FRIENDS IN LATIN AMERICA

On numbers of occasions The State, having very direct inside information on the subject, has directed attention to the fact that in their conduct of business in foreign countries, but more especially in Latin America, the citizens of the United States expect and demand much more from their Government than do nationals of any other country doing business abroad; that our Government takes cognizance of complaints that nationals of Britain or Germany would not think of making, and that while in most of these cases our Government has no idea of pushing its intervention to a serious point, it does bring its influence to bear when it should not be employed and when it offends the dignity of the little country. There are two inevitable results: The Governments of those small countries have their backs up when we come around and the traders there trade with us only when they can get what they want nowhere else.

Now, comes Senator BLAINE, of Wisconsin, progressive Republican, who also has inside information and offers this concurrent resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the policy of this country with reference to investments and the conduct of trade by American citizens in foreign countries should be grounded upon the following principles:

"1. American citizens engaged in trade or commerce in foreign countries must obey the laws of these countries.

"2. Investments made by American citizens are subject to the laws of the country wherein they are made.

"3. The Government of the United States will not assume responsibility for the fulfillment of contractual arrangements made by American citizens with foreign governments or with private citizens of foreign countries.

"4. Before American citizens can expect the Government of the United States to take any action with reference to their complaints that they have been unfairly dealt with in foreign countries, they must first have exhausted the remedies available to them in the courts of such countries.

"5. If, in the opinion of the President of the United States, decisions made by the court of last resort in any foreign country deny to American citizens the same rights accorded to nationals of other countries or violate the principles of international law, and also in the event that the legislative or executive branches of such foreign governments shall refuse to observe decisions of their courts favorable to American citizens, this country will endeavor to adjust such differences through friendly negotiations and stands ready to submit the same to arbitration.

"6. In no event will the Government of the United States have recourse to arms or resort to force in any manner to gain or preserve for American citizens rights and privileges in any foreign country beyond those enjoyed by the native citizens of such country.

"7. For the security of the Government of the United States, and to promote peace, the interests of the governments in this hemisphere are mutual. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and the governments of the world to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend privileges and engage in conduct not permitted to the Government of the United States or its citizens under the foregoing declarations as dangerous to our peace and safety. We could not view any attempt on the part of a foreign government to encroach upon the rights of small nations and the equality of nations guaranteed to the countries of this hemisphere in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."

Adopt that as this Government's policy—and apply it faithfully—and it would do more in five years to bring about real friendliness, where now exists nothing but lip friendliness, between "El Colossus del Norte" and more than a dozen Latin-American countries, than all the speech making by Presidents and Secretaries of State and former Secretaries of State could possibly accomplish in a lifetime.

There is nothing unusual or radical in Mr. BLAINE'S resolution. The Department of State would probably say it is practically identical with "our long-established policy." So it is, but the Department of State seldom dares to resist the call, backed by this or that business influence and this or that influential politician, to "use its good offices," in cases in which it has no business to meddle at all. Then it gets "hooked," and goes further and further, sometimes reaching the stage of threatening language. To the same class of calls to which Washington responds, London answers: "We are running our business; our business is not to run your business. Stand on your own feet."

If fortified with a definite expression from Congress such as Senator BLAINE proposes, the Department of State might develop the courage to resist pressure that should not be applied.

WATERS BETWEEN MINNESOTA AND ONTARIO

Mr. SCHALL. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article written by myself relative to the development of power in the international boundary waters between Minnesota and Ontario.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted. The article is as follows:

THE DE-CREATOR—E. W. BACKUS AND HIS WATER-POWER PROJECT—CONCERNING THE BURNING QUESTION OF THE THREATENED RUINATION OF THE SUPERIOR-QUETICO REGION BETWEEN MINNESOTA AND ONTARIO

By Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL

(United States Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL is a man of the most sterling character and highest integrity, and an exponent of spiritual idealism in statesmanship. His intimate knowledge of the Superior-Quetico situation, as revealed in this article, is a warning to all conservationists and lovers of the forest to guard their heritage. Editor Out Door America.)

Northern Minnesota has a reserve, known as Superior National Forest. Adjoining it, Ontario has a similar area, the Quetico Forest Reserve, 160 by 125 miles of primitive forest, extensive as Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut combined. The last stand of the forest primeval, a priceless heritage;

"Where murmuring pines and hemlocks, Stand like harpers of eld."

Still through the 20,000 square miles of forest roam moose, fox, wolves, deer, bear, muskrat, beaver, wild life in its original free, happy state; the waters are full of fish; game of all sorts finds sanctuary.

Without doubt, if left alone, the two Governments will follow out the desire of the Izaak Walton League of America, and similar organizations, and make of this a playground for the continent, under supervision of the two Governments. If kept so, it would permit a glimpse of the North—

"Where the trees together stand
Closer than the blades of wheat,
When the summer is complete."

And furnish a development to the soul of man, bring to him the vision of this great thing from which we have come, the environment that made our hardy pioneers firm in backbone and strenuous in thew and sinew. And you can reach it in a night's ride from Chicago.

Lovers of hills, dales, woods, lakes, rocks, dells, trout-filled streams, rivers, rapids, and waterfalls, come from all over the United States by the thousands. This national-forest area belongs, not to any specific individual, for exploitation, but was set aside by President Roosevelt for the youth of the Nation. As time goes on, and the frontier passes away, it will be of increasing value; a Backus and a Roosevelt are ever antipathetic; spirit in conflict with material. If the lone wolf of the Northwest has his way, the border lakes from Rainy Lake to Pigeon River, will be turned into a series of great storage ponds, by dams erected at Government expense for the benefit of the Backus-Brooks paper, pulp, lumber, and power industries.

This jewel spot is in grave danger of exploitation. It has become a question of burning national as well as local interest. I said, four years ago, in the House of Representatives, "They [Backus-Brooks Co.] have for years, regardless of anyone's rights, been pursuing a ruthless course in the construction of water-power dams. They are vitally interested in the international boundary waters treaty between Canada and the United States." For four years, I have felt alone, a voice crying in the wilderness. It is good to hear the echoes coming back, and feel the ever-growing numbers awakening to this menace.

The enunciation of the destructive plan afoot stirred rumbles of protest and indignant letters to the International Joint Commission. The secretary, technically truthful, replied, "There is pending before the International Joint Commission no application for the granting of water-power rights in the boundary waters." However, E. W. Backus had made application to the Minister of Lands and Forests, Toronto, for the right to construct many dams and control the level of waters all along this northern country.

The International Joint Commission sent a questionnaire to a large number of people, E. W. Backus among them. A hearing was held at International Falls, September, 1925. The report of the hearings is published as a Government document and can be secured by writing the International Joint Commission, Washington, D. C. Testimony indisputably shows that raising the water level will turn this whole region into a dreary, tree-rotted devastation. It will ruin this recreational asset, the last of the wilderness areas east of the Rockies. When man tampers with nature, it is never with improving fingers. His changes are a menace to fish and plant and animal and human life.

State lands and settlers' lands alike have already suffered irreparable injuries from Backus's existing Rainy Lake Dams. Warroad has been flooded. Three more feet raise would drown out Fort Frances, Ontario. And what would 5 to 30 feet raise mean, which is Backus's proposition? Existing spawning beds have been eliminated and great damage caused by constant variations in the water level. When the level is high in the fall, the ice forms, later the water beneath is drained away. In the spring shoals of dead fish are found, and great numbers of dead muskrats and beavers who can not accommodate their way of life nor endure the rapid artificial change, resultant on a storage system. Any considerable raise would utterly destroy the numerous beautiful islands. Some of the dead trees when cut through had 95 annular rings, showing that not in a hundred years had such floods occurred. The mass of standing dead timber will create in the periodic low level great fire hazard, surely grim enough now in the memory of all those northern settlers.

Millions of dollars' worth of damage suits have been brought against Backus. But relief for him has come through his long-sought treaty between the United States and Canada, generally known as the Lake of the Woods treaty, which gives the authority to raise these water levels and divides the damages to property for such raise between the United States and Canada. But because governments can't be sued, can't be pushed, can't be hurried, anything like actual damages have gone to the winds for this whole country that has been and will be overflowed. People damaged may possibly get a small percentage. As to future damages, no one can tell where they will lead and all for what? To raise the water power on the United States side a few per cent; the remaining per cent will develop in Canada, where they have already more power than they can possibly use.

It gives us pause to consider the colossal selfishness that would lay barren God's work, the wilderness. The harm once done is done forever. Once Midas has transmuted the lovely vivid life of pine forest, stream, and flashing lake into stiff and ugly gold, not all our prayers can change it back again.

And what's the good of it? Who wants this power? Nobody but the lumber, pulp, and paper magnate. There isn't population to require heavy power. There are only four towns in all this vast region. Tourist traffic is bringing each year more and more millions of dollars into the State, offsetting many times the potential water-power possibilities.

To the eye of the materialist, conservation means saving from waste, the squeezing of the ultimate penny. To him, a river is just so much water power and nothing more. If it flows on its way, he looks upon the water that is gone as so much material loss, possible profits wasted. The gold side of the medal is the only one. To the silver things of the spirit, he is forever unseeing. He has no conception what the wilderness means to the canoeist, joyously roughing it, keenly welcoming the difficulties, thrilled at the tussle with rocks and foaming rapids, fed with beauty of falls, and finding zest in the troubles of packing kit around, doing for himself and building health and strength through overcoming the pioneer problems.

The great danger of the age is that material development is far outstripping the spiritual, lack of balanced development is suicidal. Let us keep this quiet solitude, with its healing to the soul, its vision of beauty, untampered.

In every true American's heart is the zest of the wilds that has come down through his ancestors. Here's the chance to take his tired nerves, frayed by his struggle with materialism, and repair them in the balm of solitude and communion with nature, and his God.

In his opening statement before the International Joint Commission hearings, Backus finds food for great mirth at the warning that all this is to be put in jeopardy. Complaining he works 18 hours a day, he says that he'd like to vacation too, but he can't see anything in the canoeist's way. He honestly thinks that if he does away with falls and rapids and lakes too, in some cases, to make a smooth artificial thing, where canoes can go along as he says without all that bother, he will be a benefactor. He'd like to "joy ride" that way, though he'd like a fast motor boat better. It would save all the time as well as the bother.

He says the trees that fringe the lake front are "no good." The pine-crested islands, which would be submerged are "no good." And the pasture and meadowland, that's "no good." Asked about the remaining timber, much of which is over 2 feet through, he said, "Oh, we've got all the timber of any value. What's left should be saved." Saved! He means cut down. If any lone brave giant has escaped the all-destroying ax, let's go and save him! The only saving, to this man with the blind spot is to save for himself the money value—dollars and cents. And it is a real opinion, he announces openly and unblushingly.

He also says that his proposed change would only mean a new shore line just like the old one when the timber and brush is down and cut away. Now, when would that be? Who is going to do it? The dying, dead, and rotting timber would stand many years before nature could heal the scars; and the beaches of slow sand accretions, they'd never build again. Thousands and thousands of years have gone to their making. They can't be duplicated. With titanic disregard this man views the chaos he proposes. Like a negative-destroying decreator he talks blandly of "pulling" lakes, diverting channels, blotting out contours. With complete confidence in his unbrooked power over the commission, Senators, Congressmen, governors, attorneys general, State auditors, fish commissioners, presidential influence, etc., he says, "Make no doubt about it, it's going to be done."

It doesn't seem to me the International Joint Commission could possibly bring themselves in the interest of one man to make commitments at the expense of the entire people of the United States. If the truth could be understood, feeling would become intense over the whole country.

The youth of our land should have consideration over an elderly, hundred times millionaire, who, from his own statement, never had any playtime and in whom the dire necessity of boyhood developed naturally into a fanatical grubbing for money. With money came power. With more money came more power until a power mania has enveloped him and become his god. The desire is there to do the thing as he conceives it, and the more opposition to that desire the more it whets his unconquerable spirit.

The ways of this great overlord are devious, and things are done past belief; things that vision or foresight could not indicate. Don't underestimate him. He is a Napoleon in brains and matchless in boldness. And no one can look upon his vast accomplishments without feeling an awe and appreciation for the gigantic force he is. A mastery, a lone courage, a dash, a go-ahead spirit, a mental conception, a bulldog stick-to-it-iveness that disregards all obstacles, demands the admiration of any just man who has the slightest conception of the enduring strength it takes to wrest from an unwilling world the success this dictator Backus has made a part of himself. He takes no one into his real confidence as to what is the gigantic purpose behind this colossal undertaking. His wits are keen; he is a most remarkable and dangerous man. He juggles facts to utterly bewilder the simple. In his progress from poor boy to multimillionaire he has become so intrenched in the belief in his own power that he regards this permission he seeks as already granted and the wilderness his property to do with as he wills.

The casual onlooker may think Backus is not in politics. On the contrary, he is seeking with colossal assumption to have the Government pay the expense of building the dams and all the damage of the overflow. Later he proposes, as his demand for power increases, to use these dams, and when he does use them he magnanimously consents to pay back to the Government one-half the construction cost. That's politics, and politics alone. He needs the good will of Government officials everywhere. The whole foundation of his fortune was based on the development and utilization of natural resources. It has been imperative as his basis of political operation to control Minnesota politics, and in this international scheme which he has no doubt been unfolding in his mind for many years he has formed a similar sphere of influence in the Province of Ontario, where he has immense timber and water-power holdings, recently acquired through his powerful political fist. He contributes heavily to the campaign fund of all parties that he may have a foot in every camp.

He alone contributed $150,000 in 1924 to put over the Mussolini idea in Minnesota and under the fictitious slogan of economy, though tax checks have been higher and higher and will be still higher put into the hands of the governor unconstitutional dictatorial power. He was the means of raising for this same State gubernatorial campaign $150,000 more from other kindred souls, perhaps some of the 10,000 big business men of Minnesota, who, Backus testified in the Minnesota State Senate hearings, would go further than he to defeat me. It has been vital for him to keep his eye on public officials that they do not hinder him. Of course, he is in politics. His idea of politics is to have acquiescence. If his project is to be defeated, the only defense of those opposing him is politics. Backus's kind is never licked. Public officials he either makes march or he breaks, if he can. Backus got his treaty over, he got his dams, he gets everything he wants. He wanted a survey of this project at Government expense. No one else wanted it. He got it. Where does he get this power? He keeps his partner, William Brooks, in active politics in the State senate, and as Republican national committeeman, while he manipulates from the side lines. Why did Republican Backus want Farmer Labor Senator Magnus Johnson on this International Joint Commission? Why did he go to the President for Magnus? Why did he have his partner, William Brooks, the Republican national committeeman, write to the President to ask that Farmer Labor Magnus be appointed? Because he knew this very question was to come up. He testified at the Minnesota State Senate hearings, as follows:

"Mr. BACKUS. Senator Johnson asked me if he would be obliged to look for opposition from me in this matter. While I told him frankly I did not think I would have very much to say about the matter, but the way he had handled himself in assisting in putting through this Lake of the Woods treaty, getting that cleaned up, I would not oppose his application; in fact would even go to the President and ask him to give it to him.

"So I went to the President and suggested it might be a good political move, as long as it was a nonpolitical appointment, to give it to Senator Johnson.

"Q. He was not appointed?—A. No, I am sorry to say; not appointed, because it would have been a God's blessing to Senator SCHALL if it had been made.

"Senator SCHALL. If I had agreed to that appointment there would never have been a contest, would there, Mr. Backus?

"Mr. BACKUS. No; I do not believe there would, Senator.

"By TOM DAVIS:

"Q. In my understanding of your business interests in the northern part of the State, your companies would have considerable to do with the joint commission in fixing of water levels?—A. More or less; yes.

"Q. And that decision of the commission would affect either favorably or adversely your interests in that locality?—A. Yes; to a greater or lesser extent.

"Q. And by your interests, I mean your financial interests. You understand that?—A. I do.

"Q. Magnus called how many times would you say in January, February, and March this year? Called at your office and had talks with you?—A. I could not say, but three or four, maybe three or four, maybe four or five."

Those interested in defeating this project should write their Congressmen and Senators. But it is especially imperative that Minnesotans and Ontarians write their prospective candidates, Senators, Congressmen, governors, auditors, attorneys general, game and fish commissioners, etc., and have them go on record as to where they stand and get assurance of their active cooperation against this plan. No straddling should be accepted. To succeed, he must have the officials of this State and Province at least not aggressively opposed to his project.

He makes the road so hard to those that oppose him that it's a warning of destruction to any that might look to follow. What chance has an individual who dares stick his nose into what Backus considers his business? Public men naturally hesitate before opposing his invulnerable power, wielded through his tremendous political machine.

I am loath to refer to what might seem to be a personal matter; but if the people are to understand, it's illuminating as an example; for the fight on me is not private, but public, and therefore of general interest to the individual because of the great office the people elected me to, and the influence that goes with it.

Besides opposing his pet project, I was the means of helping him pay $3,000,000 and over back taxes. Because of my stand, I incurred his enmity. I have had nothing but misery and sorrow since. Four years ago I put myself clearly on record, as shown by my remarks in Congress on May 19, 1924, which were, in part:

"It is the scheme of the old selfish political plunder gang, headed by Backus, with his hands in almost every business of the State, holding in contempt assessors, county commissioners, State tax commissions, income-tax officers, with a well-known trend of ruthlessness in their operations well greased with their millions of ill-gotten gain, filched from the Commonwealth, against a humble, blind representative of the people.

"I would fail in respect to myself and to my people and to my God if I shirked this disagreeable but imperative duty of exposing the long, grisly fingers that are reaching in to control national politics.

"The Backus crowd not only hold a strangling grip upon Minnesota's financial resources but their ramifications extend into Canada, and are therefore international. A few years since, as a short cut to control of the Ontario government, they put over the Farmer-Labor ticket for the purpose of securing great concessions in timber and water power. They have not been negligent in seeking to grab control of such a movement in Minnesota. They are vitally interested in the international boundary waters treaty between Canada and the United States. They have for years, regardless of anyone's rights, been pursuing a ruthless course in the construction of water-power dams.

"Then, too, there is a little matter of several millions of dollars of income taxes due to the Government of the United States, which Backus is vitally interested in escaping. I have introduced House Resolution 301 to investigate this tax steal, and in case I am the Republican candidate for the United States Senate I want it understood that I am in no way connected with this boodling, reactionary gang; and if I am elected to the United States Senate I shall be as free as I have been during my 10 years' service in the House. No clique, gang, corporation, organization, or person has a 5-cent piece invested in the office I hold.

"Bill Brooks is now on his way to be Republican national committeeman of the State of Minnesota, and unless public opinion stops him he will be so elected at the Cleveland convention. Why is he so anxious to be national committeeman? Because if things go as this old reactionary gang has planned then he will practically be the United States Senator, for the Farmer-Labor candidate will be without the pale of the Republican administration and can 'but peep to what he would,' and the national patronage of the State, together with other tremendous influences, will be solely within the hands of the national committeeman. This is a condition that would exactly suit these selfish interests. And this is the condition for which they have set the political stage in Minnesota."

Backus never looked upon me as the right sort of timber in all my public service, and on record as I am, I am an obstacle to the plans for gaining control of this water power. I should be made an example of, a glaring warning. If I am destroyed, I will be a citation of ruin to the recalcitrant. But if I am left "standing" after what I have done and said, it will be a bad precedent; in the position I hold, very dangerous, for I might any time see fit to make further observations. So he wants to "save" me by cutting me down in 1930, since there have been three failures to unseat me otherwise. The political chessboard in Minnesota is now being adroitly arranged to that end. And the man chosen to accomplish that feat has, because of his economy complex, already passed over his chance in 1928 and announced his candidacy for my place in the United States Senate in 1930.

Here is some testimony under oath by Mr. Backus:

"Q. You are not on friendly terms with Senator TOM SCHALL?—A. I have not any high regard for him.

"Q. Have these taxes been paid, Mr. Backus?—A. They have.

"Q. Three million dollars?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That, of course, would not make you have the highest regard in the world for Mr. SCHALL, would it?—A. I think Senator SCHALL was extremely unfair and unwise. I just want to say this further, and my complaint as to the attitude of Mr. SCHALL, when he was Congressman, on the floor of Congress, in all fairness before making the statement before the body as he did, he should have sent for me and said, 'I want to talk to you about this.'

"Mr. DAVIS. Your position is, before Senator SCHALL brought this matter to Congress, nonpayment of your taxes, he should have sent for E. W. Backus and talked the matter over with him?—A. Yes.

"Mr. DAVIS. Is it not a fact that if a man other than Senator SCHALL was sitting in the Senate, a man who would send for you and talk to you, it would be much better for you because of your taxes, speaking of a cold-blooded financial situation, Mr. Backus?

"Mr. BACKUS. Well I admit it would be better to have someone there who would handle matters of this kind in a businesslike way.

"Mr. DAVIS. SCHALL seems to have handled this matter in such a businesslike way that Backus-Brooks paid $3,160,000 in taxes that the Government found was owing, and earned his salary for 350 years."

Yet despite the above, certain newspapers in my State continue to quote Backus a contributor to my campaign in 1924. I never met the man. The first time and the only time that I ever saw or heard him was while he was testifying in the Minnesota Senate Schall-Smear hearings, and I know and everybody else knows that he fought me at that election and will do so again with all the resources—and there are many—at his command.

A man did come to my office and stated that he had just come from an interview with Backus, and Backus told him that it would be worth one-half million dollars to him if I would be fair and reasonable. And if I had been thus fair and reasonable no doubt I would to-day be heralded by these same newspapers throughout the State as one of Minnesota's great men, instead of merely being the ill consequence of a primary election. No wonder Backus and his ilk want to do away with primaries and go back to the businesslike convention system, where you get what you contract for.

During my candidacy for the Republican nomination for the United States Senate almost every newspaper in the State was against me. Not because of my record. They did not attack that. I was finally nominated against the opposition of all sorts of political associations, clubs, and organizations, and immediately a contest was filed in the courts against my nomination. It was dismissed by the courts. I made my campaign alone, and without organization. Due to some mysterious power I had to fight not only the two opposition parties but most of the organization of my own party.

Despite it, I won out. I was no sooner elected than grand juries were importuned to indict me for fictitious and alleged offenses. Next a fake contest was instigated in the United States Senate for the purpose of giving carte blanche to publishing malicious lies with impunity because of the public-document status the complaint against me had acquired. This pseudo contest failed by unanimous vote of the committee and the entire Senate, without even one word of denial on my part.

The following remarks were made June 16, 1926, in the Senate, after that body, finding every allegation without foundation, had unanimously dismissed the complaint:

"During my 10 years' service in the House I tried to protect the people from the encroachments of those who had no regard for the eighth commandant—'Thou shalt not steal'—and in so doing incurred the deadly hatred of a concern of tremendous finance, beyond dispute the most powerful influence in Minnesota politics.

"This sinister influence, with its vast power distributed throughout the State, opposed me with all its strength, by fair and foul means—mostly foul—in the last election and was maniacally enraged at my victory. Then, patched together from campaign lies and whole cloth, comes this so-called contest, without even a denial that I had received a majority of the votes. It was absolutely without foundation as to any wrongdoing of mine, as the record of the hearing entirely bears out. Its purpose was to destroy my influence as Senator, to slander, belittle, and irritate, to the end that I might be forced to succumb or be so weakened in the eyes of the voters of my State that my reelection would be made impossible. The instigators of this contest knew that it was absolutely baseless, and framed it from the start as a possible trading proposition whereby they sought to enforce my indorsement of Magnus Johnson's appointment to the International Joint Commission, but when they found that no trade was possible they carried it on for advertising purposes to its farcical end; meanwhile the flaming accusations were blazoned from one end of the country to the other, for startling charges always get front-page space, while denials or the final outcome go unnoticed.

"Insidious, clever, lying propaganda was abundantly spread in the Capitol through button-holing by presentable hirelings. Carefully instigated malicious newspaper clippings were forwarded through the mail. Members of the Senate and the House and the employees of each and the departments were thus thoroughly canvassed in an effort to prejudice and destroy my prestige and good name, the so-called contest meanwhile being used as a background."

Through the influence of Backus's partner, State Senator William Brooks, Republican national committeeman, a resolution was put through the Minnesota State Senate, in March, 1927, for another "smear" investigation which after six weeks of wide-open hearing was unanimously dismissed by the committee, and the entire State senate.

During the hearings one of the prosecution's witnesses became very ill and doctors said he was liable to die. Whereupon he called in the priest, took the last sacrament, and made a confession in which he laid bare the whole conspiracy wherein he and two others had plotted to get $30,000 for their perjured testimony. This testimony was corroborated in its vital parts by Backus and his lawyer, to whom he referred this witness, after phoning him to call and see him.

This Schall hearing was forced onto the State senate despite the fact that the senate had no more jurisdiction to hold such hearing than the aldermen of the village of Podunk would have to unseat the President of the United States. But there was sagacious method in this procedure, for grave charges were flying about that there was a great shortage in the office of the State treasurer. This official had recently resigned to accept appointment by the governor as one of the big three.

An investigation of this treasury shortage was being demanded. The big three is a newly created unconstitutional implement by which the governorship of the State of Minnesota was changed into a dictatorship.

Also, there was being demanded an investigation of the action of a member of the securities commission recently appointed by the governor. After the legislature closed this member was indicted and is now on trial in the United States courts for felony in that office. Both of these proposed investigations were clearly the duty of the State senate and within its jurisdiction. But in order to hold the attention of the people from what was their plain duty they went entirely outside their jurisdiction and set up a counterattraction for a smoke screen to hold the attention of the public until the legislature by statutory provision must adjourn, and under the eyes of State Senator Brooks, Republican national committeeman, who dishes out campaign funds and State patronage, they passed a resolution to investigate TOM SCHALL'S election, although they knew it was res adjudicata by the United States Senate. They hoped to put over a twofold fraud to smear me and at the same time cover the laches of the State administration, and again demonstrated that the private wrong to me has become inextricably entangled with the wrong done the public. My attorneys during these hearings offered testimony to show that over $300,000 had been raised to elect the governor, but four of the carefully selected inquisitorial committee of five would not allow the introduction of such evidence.

To-day some one is paying men to go about the country with a novel, in which I am supposed to be the villain, purporting to be written by a former political manager of mine. I have never had any manager, political or otherwise, in my 14 years public life, but Mrs. Schall. This novel is a tissue of falsehoods, misleading, misrepresenting, with nothing of truth in it but portions of speeches I have delivered in Congress, and those speeches twisted out of their application. These men stop at the best hotels and live on the fat of the land, and it does not matter whether they sell books or not, the proffer for sale gives an opporunity to start conversation and spread the malicious gossip. If the book is not bought, they give it to you. They have a set news review, which appears word for word, in all the Backus papers. The Washington News even fell for it. They have a man here in the Capital, staying at one of the most expensive hotels and furnished with a luxurious sedan for his convenience in getting about to influential officials of the Government. No books are being sold, but the canvass keeps up.

Backus's controlled newspapers, together with his tremendous political organization throughout Minnesota, keep constantly before the people of my State all sorts of slanderous, belittling, incriminating references to me. If anyone comes to me in behalf of a friend or relative in jail, if anyone commits a crime or a misdemeanor in Minnesota, and it can be found out that he knew or spoke to or supported me at election or at any time was employed by me, or saw or wrote me about getting a job, they link my name with his and give it front-page space, and constantly they quote that the people of my State, when they vote for me, must hold their noses.

The Friday before election in 1924, 300 men were sent out over the State with a forged Catholic bulletin in one pocket and a bogus Ku-Klux Klan paper in the other, and two lists of persons carefully picked who would be prejudiced by one or the other.

One of Backus's lieutenants not long ago was asked if Backus thought he could lick SCHALL in 1930. The lieutenant replied, "Backus thinks so, but I don't, and have told him so. But he insists that it shall be done if it costs him a million dollars. "I told him, 'It can't be done, Ed, if you spent two million.' We had pretty near all the newspapers in 1924, all political organizations; opposing him the most popular and spectacular candidate Minnesota has ever known; we lifted 40,000 votes and still we didn't get him. And he's sure stronger now than he was then, thanks to the advertisement your fool State senate hearings gave him."

The Minneapolis pettifogger who conducted the prosecution against me in the United States Senate, and who said during that proceeding that he didn't care how long it lasted as he was getting $100 a day and his expenses, is even now busy trying to secure perjured affidavits upon which to base another complaint before the United States Senate that they may thus for the third time acquire immunity and excuse to broadcast slander.

It is quite in character with this alert mind that now Backus should seize the psychological moment and declare—what up to now he has not advanced, that his plan is one of flood control. He hoists himself thus by his bootstraps. A host of Backus flood-control propaganda is let loose. Dignified magazines and newspapers publish it. There will be plenty of it from now on. The dams make the floods, not, as Mr. Backus makes haste to assure, "do away with the flood menace." So far as Minnesota is concerned, his modest acceptance of the credit for a vast flood control is knocked in the eye by the statement of O. L. Kaupanger, secretary of the Minnesota State division of the Izaak Walton League, in a newspaper interview January 17, 1928.

Mr. Kaupanger says: "The one difficulty, from the point of view of residents of the region, is to understand why flood control should be needed in a region where in its natural state floods are unknown. Not in the memory of man has the water ever remained high enough on any uncontrolled lake or river in the Rainy Lake region to affect vegetation. Since the chain of lakes have been dammed there have been disastrous floods." And if the rest of these dams are permitted and the waters impounded and the levels raised from 5 to 30 feet, no one can predict the utter destruction and widespread desolation.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 83) authorizing an investigation of public-utility corporations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. KING. May I inquire what is the pending amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 5, the committee proposes, after the word "corporations," to insert the words "doing an interstate business."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, does not the question recur on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] to the committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; that is not an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I have always thought that one of the most valuable functions that a legislative assembly can be called upon to perform is that of investigation. To some purposes such an assembly is very imperfectly adapted. It is the poorest kind of an executive; it is even a worse judge; but as an inquisitorial instrument it is one of the most effective things at times of which I know. Every legislative assembly, of course, should turn an attentive ear to every popular complaint. It should not be slow to explore abuses, nor should it be slow to expose corporate or individual misconduct of any kind. But at the same time, Mr. President, this inquisitorial function of the legislature is a thing that like all other forms of power should not be abused; so ever since I have been a Member of this body I have insisted whenever there was a proposal to have the Senate investigate any industry or any person that a sound prima facie case should first be made out. What would we think if an individual were tried before he had been indicted or arraigned; that is, before there had been at least some kind of accusatory ex parte investigation made into the question as to whether he was guilty or innocent?

Of course, to a certain extent it is a popular thing to bait corporations and great industries. That kind of thing measurably appeals to the unthinking, unreflecting mass of the community; but I say it is just as wrong, just as indefensible to accuse a great industry and to follow up the accusation, no matter how vague, by an investigation before a prima facie case of some sort has been made out as it would be for a grand jury to indict the citizen before at least some substantial ex parte testimony had been adduced tending to establish the guilt of the accused.

There has been more than one investigation prosecuted by this body since I have been here. One was prosecuted, with a striking measure of brilliant success, by the untiring industry, the keen technical insight, and the rare forensic abilities of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. That was a real investigation, an investigation warranted if not by specific accusations at least by an atmosphere of widespread and aggravated suspicion that the Government had been flagitiously despoiled of its property. Then came along the investigation into the conduct of Attorney General Daugherty and his unsavory associates. Just as I gave my approval to the oil investigation I gave my approval to that, asking in that instance, too, only that there should be, so far as possible, a fair, impartial, and dispassionate investigation.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], it will be recollected, rose at that time and said that Mr. Daugherty was as clean as a hound's tooth. In point of fact, it proved that the Senator should have taken his simile from the other end of the dog. But, as I have said, the function of legislative investigation can be abused, and readily abused, from all sorts of motives. Now we have reached the point at which there seems to be in this Chamber an absolute rage, a mania, nothing less than a mania, for investigation. In a short time there will be nothing left to investigate except the senatorial investigators themselves. At this time there are pending in the Senate no less than 18 different investigations. Indeed, I doubt whether my statement is sufficiently exhaustive.

With the greatest respect, I say that perhaps more conspicuously than any other Member of this body, the Senator from Montana has succumbed to the propensity to investigation. As I have had occasion to observe, he seems to find the same degree of pleasure in investigation that some men find in intoxication. He is like a tiger who tastes human blood and then becomes a man-eater for the rest of his life. I commend to him therefore the importance when he indulges his taste for investigation of selecting some object that unquestionably calls for investigation.

I said a few moments ago that after a while there will be nothing for the investigators in this Chamber to investigate except themselves, and I now wish to say to the Senator from Montana that at this very time he has an opportunity to bring about such an investigation. A dispatch has recently come from Florida stating that a witness on the stand in a case there a few days ago testified that he had been engaged in the unlawful business of importing liquor into this country, and that among his customers was more than one Member of the Senate of the United States. If everything is to be investigated, why does not the Senate, I repeat, investigate itself?

Again, should the Senator from Montana be wholly unable to resist the pruriency of investigation, I commend to him the expediency of investigating the transactions and operations of the Custodian of the Alien Property Fund. Again and again in the last few months the intimation has come to me from reliable sources that if the probe were put in there it would strike a pus sac of no little magnitude; and yet nobody seems to be willing to put the probe in, fierce and uncompromising as is the spirit of investigation that prevails in this Chamber. Why is that? Perhaps because the roots of that office are to some extent planted in the remoter past, and a full investigation of its history might enmesh Democrats as well as Republicans in its net on the eve of a presidential election.

I am one of those Democrats who believe with Benjamin Franklin that a rascal hanged out of a family confers more credit on it than all its irreproachable members; and if any Democratic lawyer as well as Republican lawyer has been receiving, in connection with the workings of the office of Alien Property Custodian, grossly exorbitant fees, or if any Democrat as well as Republican has been in some other form receiving graft arising out of that office, by all means let us have an investigation. Extreme as I think this spirit of investigation has become, I would be willing, if that were the field of investigation——

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. No; not at this moment. I will yield to the Senator later.

I know, of course, that I shall not be able to prevail with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. He is so constituted that when he is opposed to an investigation he is as fanatically uncompromising as when he is in favor of one. Some of us have not forgotten the fact that in 1926, when we asked the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, of which he was a member, for an investigation into the practical workings of prohibition, from first to last he set his face like flint against any such investigation. We who felt so strongly upon this vital subject, we who believed prohibition to be such a tyrannical and scandalous system, would have been absolutely denied, if the Senator from Montana had had his way, the privilege of demonstrating to the country that prohibition had been the prolific parent of oppression, of lawlessness, of corruption, of scandal, and of bloodshed.

Ah, but there were other men on the Judiciary Committee quite as strong prohibitionists as the Senator from Montana, and they, all honor to them, saw to it that we had fair play. There was an investigation, there was a hearing, with the result that they demonstrated the fact that out of a Prohibition Unit force of a few thousand men no less than 875 scamps had been dismissed from the Prohibition Unit, either for violations of the Volstead Act or for one form of downright rascality or another.

The Senator from Montana will indeed be successful, if this special committee shall be formed and he shall be its chairman, should he bring into the meshes of his investigation as many as 875 rapscallions engaged in the electric light and power business of this country; and yet that was the bag which that prohibition investigation made. And, mind you, that list of 875 dismissed prohibition officers did not include any members of the Prohibition Unit force who had been merely suspected and asked to resign, and, needless to say, no members of the force who had been guilty of criminal offenses but had been clever enough in one way or another to avert suspicion.

If investigation is a good thing, it is a still better thing when it works both ways, and not simply when some man with a perfervid nature, moved by his enthusiastic temperament, or perhaps by the ambition to be President, or by some other secondary or ulterior motive, gives himself up to purely prosecuting zeal. Even now there are some people saying in this country to Democrats like myself who happen to be great admirers of Gov. Alfred E. Smith, "Why do you not drop your wet Catholic and take up a dry Catholic?" And perhaps a highly efficient and successful investigation in this case might operate in no considerable transfer of allegiance on the part of Democrats from one presidential candidate to another.

When the pending resolution went to the Interstate Commerce Committee I expected, if that committee had a good prima facie case against the electric light and power companies of this country presented to it, to give my approval to the creation of the special committee mentioned in it. Of all its members, I was perhaps the one that was most studious to see that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] had the amplest opportunity to make out such a prima facie case. In the very beginning of the proceedings of the committee I suggested that we should have a full opening statement from him, thinking, of course, that he would frame in that statement something in the nature of a real indictment against the electric light and power corporations; and afterwards, when the question arose as to whether or not the witnesses before the committee were to be cross-examined on behalf of the sponsors of the resolution by the Senator from Montana, I, in the face of no little opposition, took the position that the Senator from Montana should have the right to cross-examine any of the witnesses that he saw fit. Indeed, such abundant opportunities were afforded to him to participate in the hearings of the committee that he himself has been responsive and grateful enough to say on the floor of the Senate that we was treated with the utmost degree of courtesy by the committee in the course of the hearings.

I waited in vain, however, for the prima facie case, and so did every other member of the committee. You may go over those printed hearings, and you will not find a really substantial thing to justify the investigation at this time of all the interstate electric light and power companies of this country. Mind you, if the Senator from Montana had had his way, the investigation would not have been limited to interstate electric light and power companies. He proposed to reach, with the searchlight of investigation, not only every interstate electric light and power company in the United States but every intrastate electric light and power company in it as well, no matter how reduced its scale of importance, no matter how limited its operations.

Nor is this all. Not only did he propose to empower the special committee called for by the pending resolution to investigate how far all these electric light and power companies, interstate and intrastate, had attempted to control the election of Presidents, Senators, and Members of the House of Representatives, but how far the election of every State official as well, no matter how petty his office. The extremes to which the Senator from Montana was disposed to go in those respects have been revised by the committee, and, I trust, will ultimately be revised by the Senate.

And let me ask, in what temper of mind did these fruitless hearings leave the Senator from Montana? Notwithstanding the fact that they proved to be a water haul, to use a fishing phrase, the Senator from Montana actually concluded them both in these words, and I ask the Members of this body to listen to them intently as I read:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, I merely desire to say this much, that in the starting of this movement I had hoped to be in a situation where I could present to any committee everything that was good in this movement, as well as everything that was evil or fraught with danger to the public, either to the investor or to the general consumer, who is obliged to pay the rates upon which these things are done. But the matter has developed—

Just listen to this:

> But the matter has developed in such a way that I am bound to assume the rôle of a prosecutor.

That is to say, the hearings commenced with the Senator as an investigator, and though nothing really reflecting upon the conduct of these electric light and power companies was elicited in the course of them, they ended with the Senator from Montana in the rôle, according to his own admission, of a prosecutor, a prosecutor to the death, a prosecuting gun loaded to kill, though, as far as the testimony at the hearings went, there was nothing to kill, nothing even to maim or cripple. Such is the spirit in which he, if he is chairman of the special committee, proposes to enter upon this investigation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That statement was made when there were present in large numbers in the committee room representatives of the great power lobby that was assembled here, which I said would probably take care of the other side of the question.

Mr. BRUCE. Power lobby! That word "lobby" has been so perverted during the course of my experience as a member of legislative bodies that I can hardly keep my bile from rising when I hear it. No honest man fears a lobby of any sort.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thought the public utilities there represented by 180 lawyers would be able to say whatever might be said in support of their end of the inquiry.

Mr. BRUCE. Perhaps it takes 180 lawyers to cope with such a lawyer as the Senator from Montana.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. DILL. The Senator knows that there is an amendment offered by the Senator from Montana proposing that the Senate shall elect the committee.

Mr. BRUCE. That proposition is pending now because the Vice President, responding to the impulses of his high-minded and honorable character, said he did not think under the circumstances that it was proper for him to name the members of the committee.

Mr. DILL. If the Senator thinks that the Senator from Montana would be so unfair, he could help elect somebody else the chairman of the committee, and elect a committee that would be fair.

Mr. BRUCE. Knowing, as they used to say down South, how "sot" the Senator from Montana is in his ways, I think we should have some difficulty in doing that without his consent, but we might.

As I said, I for one am sick of hearing these constant references to lobbies. I have been a member or connected as a law officer with legislative bodies for no small part of my life, and I have had hundreds of citizens, interested or disinterested, approach me to present their views to me with reference to legislation, and never once in all that time—I say it as if I said it at the foot of an altar—never in all that time did I ever have any human being approach me with any improper proposal as to a matter of legislation. They all, to use the happy phrase of the old English poet, felt that so far as I was concerned:

> He comes too near that comes to be denied.

I often wonder who are the members of legislative bodies who are approached with corrupt solicitations.

The Senator from Montana and I will never agree upon a proposition that all lobbyists, whether honorable lawyers or pettifoggers, whether business men of high or low degree, are a set of unconscionable, unscrupulous knaves standing at the doors of the legislature for the purpose of illicitly or insidiously influencing the course of legislation.

I say without a moment's hesitation that the lobbyist is my best friend. I would as soon complain of the approaches of any man, I care not who he is, that is interested in any matter of pending legislation to me, as I would of a witness being allowed the privilege of testifying in a case because he was interested in the case. Let the lobbyist present his case to me and I will determine for myself how far it should and how far it should not be discounted by his selfish interest in the particular legislative subject matter about which he is concerned.

The very first thing that I do whenever any matter of importance is pending in this body is to obtain all the information that I can and from any source that I can, interested or disinterested, with reference to the merits of the matter.

What were the representatives of this vast industry to do, in the judgment of the Senator from Montana? Were they to pay no heed at all to the pending resolution? Were they not to take cognizance at all of the fact that the electric light and power industry was about to be investigated, and that the electric light and power companies of the country were about to be subjected to a vast amount of expense because of the proposed investigation, to say nothing of the extent to which the value of their securities might be affected and their ability to obtain the loans that are indispensable to their maintenance impaired by reckless or unfair treatment? Were they to be denied the privilege of coming here and respectfully insisting that if there was to be an investigation it should at least be a fair, impartial, and dispassionate one?

Is it not allowable for me to say that the representatives of those electric light and power companies as American citizens had just as much right under the circumstances to stand about our doors here as we had to sit in our seats here? Ah, no, says the Senator from Montana in effect, they are nothing but a lot of ravenous wolves skulking about a stockade.

Indeed, in his views about this lobby, this ogre, this monster, this mythical rawhead and bloodybones, he becomes as irate as though aflame with moral indignation of the loftiest order at the very idea of a group of American citizens insolently coming here for the purpose of presenting their case to this body. He reminds me of a thing that I read some time ago about a London costermonger. The author said that he overheard this costermonger curse an eel because the eel would not lie still while he was skinning him. By the way, that incident takes us back to King Lear, where the cockney says to the writhing eels in the hot pan:

> Down, wantons, down!

The Senator is very much provoked because the great electric light and power industry will not lie still when threatened with unfair treatment, and exclaims, too, "Down, wantons, down!"

No prima facie case was made before the Interstate Commerce Committee, but I am willing that there should be an investigation after all this agitation; and while I have no special connection of any kind with the representatives of the electric light and power companies of the United States, as I understand it, they themselves wish an investigation, provided that it is a just, an impartial, an honest, and a nonpolitical one. They take this position, notwithstanding the fact that we are on the eve of a presidential campaign, and it is easy for all sorts of persons on the eve of such a campaign to lend themselves to all sorts of secondary and ulterior purposes in the prosecution of a legislative investigation.

In my judgment, the proper agency for this investigation is the Federal Trade Commission, and I ask this body again not to let itself be swept off its feet by any extravagant denunciation of the members of that commission. There is even my friend from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], a man as cool, deliberate, and clear-headed in action as any man I know in the world, but very vehement in the maintenance of his convictions, which are strong, as the convictions of all strong men usually are. He went so far yesterday as to state that if a man like Humphrey was to be on the Federal Trade Commission he would like to see the commission abolished; in other words, to get rid of the rat he was willing to burn down the house.

Then there were the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Montana, who similarly denounced Mr. Humphrey up hill and down dale and held him up as utterly unworthy of trust.

Now, whenever I hear such sweeping charges made against any public official I always try to preserve my balance. I voted against the appointment of Mr. Warren as Attorney General of the United States because I thought that there were special reasons why his confirmation should be rejected by this body. I had reason to think that in the discharge of his duties he might be influenced by his past business connections. I voted against the confirmation of Mr. Wood as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission because I thought that his antecedents and environments had also been such that he might not find himself in a position to discharge his duties in such a position in the disinterested manner in which public duty should be discharged by every public official.

But I can not forget that I was one of the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee which heard the case that was attempted to be made out against Mr. Humphrey. All his enemies rallied in full force. They drew up and pressed the most damning indictment that they could possibly frame. So far as I was concerned, I would have voted against his confirmation as cheerfully as I turn into my bed at night if I had thought that he was unfit to be a member of the Federal Trade Commission. But that committee gave a fair and impartial hearing to the case and concluded that the reputation, standing, and integrity of Mr. Humphrey had not been successfully impeached, and so his confirmation was recommended by the committee and was afterwards, after another effort to defeat it on the floor of the Senate, approved by the Senate.

I understand that he has just written a letter to the Senator from Montana, in view of some accusations made against him a day or so ago by that Senator, stating that the changes in the practice and procedure of the commission, to which the Senator from Montana adverted in making those accusations had, every one of them, been made with the full consent of his colleagues.

And who, pray, are his colleagues? Who would be associated with him if the proposed investigation should be referred to that commission? Of course, Mr. Huston Thompson and Mr. Nugent, both of whom are regarded—though I do not say justly regarded—by many individuals in this country as extremists, are no longer on the commission. They have been succeeded by two members whose integrity, intelligence, and qualifications in every respect for its duties can, without the slightest difficulty, be duly avouched. One of them is Judge McCulloch.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Did the Senator say that Commissioner Nugent is still on the commission?

Mr. BRUCE. No; I said he had left the commission.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; he is not now on the commission.

Mr. BRUCE. No; he is not on it. I do not know whether that fact conveys gratification to the breast of the Senator from Iowa or not.

Mr. BROOKHART. I was very much in favor of his reappointment.

Mr. BRUCE. I am not reflecting on either Mr. Thompson or Mr. Nugent. But, as I have just asked, who are the two new members of the commission? Their weight and influence seem to be left altogether out of account by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in his vitriolic tirade against Mr. Humphrey. One of them, as I said, is no less a person than Judge McCulloch, formerly of the Court of Appeals of the State of Arkansas, who stepped down from the bench of that court an honored, an illustrious, and spotless jurist, to take his place—God knows why—upon the board of an administrative Federal commission. I understand that he is one of the ablest lawyers and one of the profoundest and most upright judges in the country. Is the Senator from Montana prepared to cast aspersions upon him, too, to doubt his disposition to handle the investigation contemplated by this resolution in a perfectly proper manner in every respect should it be referred to him and his associates?

Who is the other new member of the commission? Mr. Garland S. Ferguson, the nephew of one of the most beloved and respected Members of this body, who I am told is also admirably qualified for the discharge of his duties as a member of the commission. Is the Senator from Montana prepared to shy a brick at him, too, to doubt his integrity, to distrust his ability, and to claim that he, too, would be shamelessly subservient to corporate influences notwithstanding his oath of office and the high and sacred nature of his responsibilities?

So if we are not going to have a prosecution such as the Senator from Montana seemed to contemplate in the course of the hearings to which I have been referring, but are going to have an investigation, a fair, impartial, and dispassionate investigation, why should not the Federal Trade Commission conduct it, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] asked in the course of his most luminous and convincing speech yesterday? The commission have already largely covered the field of the electric light and power industry. They have rendered two reports. One was to the effect that no evidence had been brought to their attention of any violations of the antitrust act by the electric light and power companies, and that was followed by a supplemental report. Their first report gave such striking indications of industry, of patient laborious research, of conscientious discharge of duty, that the Senator from Montana, in the course of the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee, actually referred to it as a monumental report—and such, indeed it seems to be.

But now, having acquired the mastery that they have over some phases of the electric light and power industry in the country, why should they not be allowed to complete their work and to go on to additional fields of investigation connected with the industry and to bring in another monumental report setting forth the financial set-ups and interconnection of the various electric light and power companies of the country, and showing, too, if the Senate desires it, whether any of those electric light and power companies have sought to control in any manner the elections of Senators or other Federal officials?

In other words, the alternatives presented to this body to-day, under circumstances that involve no specific accusations of misconduct against the electric light and power industry, are investigation or prosecution; and certainly the great business interests of the country are not to be vexed and harried by prosecution as distinguished from investigation except when there is some real cause for prosecution, inferable with more or less confidence from the nature of the accusations made against them.

Another thing; experience has abundantly shown that an investigation which is not carried on by this body in a proper manner does not secure the confidence of the country. I recollect that during the last presidential campaign—I believe I have quoted the remark here once before—when I happened to be sitting by Mr. John W. Davis, our Democratic candidate for the Presidency, at a dinner, he said to me, "Senator, I can not see that the oil investigation has had any effect upon public opinion in the United States at all." That was after he had been making the circuit of the country and had been delivering campaign speeches first at one point and then another. I said to him then, "But suppose that that investigation had been carried on just as efficiently, just as firmly, but had been carried on just a little less with the air of a political prosecution, do you not think that it might have had a material and telling effect upon public opinion." Of course, I will not say what his answer was.

And if anybody thinks that the Democratic Party is going to gain anything at this time, on the eve of a presidential election, by a fierce, undiscriminating prosecution of one of the greatest industries of the country, he is, in my judgment, mistaken. As I have said, if there had been specific accusations of misconduct against these companies, if any wrongdoing had been clearly brought home to them, I would be here at this moment advocating the selection of a special committee for the purpose of carrying on the investigation, and I should be glad to see the Senator from Montana once more fall into his habitual rôle as a prosecutor. But those are not the conditions that surround us. The only effect of a partisan attack upon one of the great industries of this country at the present time, so far as the Democratic Party is concerned, would be to make the people of the United States feel more strongly than they have for some time past that the Democratic Party is not the best agency to which the material interests of the Nation can be committed. I say that notwithstanding the fact that the most glorious single feature of the history of the Democratic Party to my mind is the unbending will, the adamantine face that it has always set against special privilege in every form.

However, I have already said not only enough to weary Senators but to weary myself, and I can only add in conclusion that I trust, as I have rarely ever trusted under similar circumstances in the course of my legislative life, that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] will prevail.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I was particularly impressed with the remarks of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] on the subject of the lobby in connection with the pending resolution to investigate the public utilities of this country. The Senator from Maryland boasted of the fact that nobody had made any improper proposal to him relative to the resolution. I do not know whether or not the Senator really expected those who heard him and those who will read his remarks to take him seriously when he argued that there was no lobby working in connection with this resolution. Of course, the lobby that is here and that has been here for weeks and that is working in the sections from which Senators receive correspondence is not crude nor rough; this lobby does not try to prevent this investigation or to hamstring it by sending it to the Federal Trade Commission by any such crude proposals as making improper offers to Senators. Of course, nobody has come here and attempted to buy any Senator's vote; nobody has even offered to bribe Senators with campaign contributions. They would not think of that; that is too common and coarse. They have not threatened to defeat any Senator who might vote the other way. They have risen above that kind of lobbying, because that is the old kind of lobbying. They have been much more subtle and, I think, much more efficient as a result of their subtlety. They have employed numerous and divers ways of influencing the minds of Senators.

I think every man, whether he is in public life or not, has certain characteristics; he has certain tendencies that make it possible to appeal to him and to influence his action. I might almost describe it in terms of a blind horse with which, as a boy, I was familiar in Ohio. He was a peculiar horse. He was very gentle and tractable except for one thing; that was to get a bit in his mouth whenever we tried to put the bridle on him. He had one blind eye, and if we could get up on his blind side and start the bit in his mouth before he saw us, we could get the bridle on him, and he was a fine horse for all purposes. So the lobby that has worked on the pending resolution has worked on the principle of coming up on the blind side of Senators.

The first and most common method of appeal has been to suggest that the investigation proposed is to be a political one, and that the Senator from Montana expects to make himself so notable by it that he will be nominated for President of the United States on the Democratic ticket. Mr. President, in my judgment, the Senator from Montana does not need any added glory as an investigator to make him worthy of the nomination for President or of election, for that matter; and if conditions in the public-utility financing organizations are so terrible and so glaring that the Senator from Montana, or anybody else, can make it evident to the American people that an investigation is needed, why object to his reaping the reward that might come? The truth of the matter is that the very carrying forward of the proposed investigation by the Senator from Montana would probably do more to prevent his nomination than anything else, because every power and force which these great organizations of wealth could command would be used against him to prevent his securing a two-thirds vote in the national convention. However, that argument has been effective and will be effective with Senators, as will be shown when the vote is taken.

Then, Senators have been asked to vote to cause the investigation to be made by the Federal Trade Commission, because they have been told by very close personal and political friends that they own certain public-utility stocks that will be reduced in value if this resolution shall be adopted. That appeal has been made on the part of citizens who are honest and clean and have no thought of being lobbyists, but it is effective to a certain extent when not considered in its full import. Even widows and those who hold in trust money for orphans, who have investments in public-utility stocks, make their appeal to Senators on the ground that an investigation will destroy the value of their securities and, therefore, will be a dangerous thing.

Furthermore, the appeal has been made that the proposed investigation will so frighten capital that it will delay the development of great electric-power projects in various States, and Senators have been appealed to not to vote for anything that would delay such development in their States. That is another appeal which has a powerful influence.

So the lobby which has been working here has been a lobby more clever and more subtle and more effective than any I have ever known in my public career either in the House or in the Senate.

Now, what are the facts? When this resolution was brought before the Senate at this session we were asked to vote to send it—I say we were asked; the truth is we were frequently implored—to vote to send it to the Interstate Commerce Committee. It was thought that would kill it; but when it reached the committee there was so great a sentiment in favor of reporting it that we were then asked to amend the resolution so that the investigation might be conducted by the Federal Trade Commission, and on a vote in the committee of eight to eight that was refused. Now, we have the resolution on the floor of the Senate, and we are asked to provide that the Federal Trade Commission shall conduct the investigation so that it shall not hurt anybody.

Sir, either the financing of public-utility securities is sound or it is unsound. If it is sound, no investigation can hurt public-utility stocks permanently. There might be for a week or for a month some little depression in price, but if the investigation should show that the financing was sound, no harm would be done; in fact, the position of public-utility stocks would be strengthened. If any investigation shall be made by a committee of the Senate or any other body and nothing shall be revealed in the way of wild financing and watered securities, no harm will be done; but if there are instances of financing which make the securities unsound, then the quicker the fact is exposed and the more completely it is exposed the better even for the holders of the securities themselves.

I remind you, Mr. President, that this is not merely a resolution to investigate some business which has grown up temporarily. It is to investigate not only what is already a great public business, but to investigate a business that has grown so great that no other can be compared with it.

We are on the edge of the electrical age in America. Holding companies have been buying up little power companies throughout the country, paying two and three times what has been their previous value, and incorporating them into one great holding company. In my home town of Spokane, within the past month, the Electric Bond & Share Co. paid $230 a share for the stock of the Washington Water Power Co., which furnishes the electric light and power for the inland empire between the Rockies and the Cascades in the Northwest.

When I left home on the 1st of December that stock was selling for less than half that amount, as I recall. It was purchased by the Electric Bond & Share Co. for $230. Who will pay for it? Will it be the electric light and power consumers of that community, or will it be the holders of securities which will eventually prove to have been watered 50 per cent?

Much has been said about having the proposed investigation conducted by the Federal Trade Commission, a body that was established to investigate under the law and not to ascertain information on which to predicate some new law. Practically every State in the Union has its public service commission which passes upon the bonds of public-utility companies. There is no authority in the Federal Government or in any other Federal body to control the financing and the issuing of bonds of the great interstate public-utility holding companies. To my mind the dominant reason for this resolution is that we may secure the facts in order that we may legislate intelligently to protect future investors against watered securities in the electric light and power business, rather than to allow unwholesome conditions to continue until great national scandals occur and tremendous losses are suffered by investors.

I remind you that a few years ago, when it was first advocated that the Interstate Commerce Commission should take control of the railroad securities of this country, it was looked upon as a radical and wild proposition, and yet it has been found absolutely necessary. Why? Because the dangers in railroad securities have not been due to poor railroad management, the actual operation of the railroad trains and the handling of the passengers and the freight, but the national scandals of railroads have come as a result of watering the stocks and the manipulation of those stocks on the stock markets of the country.

I will not go into the history of the Chicago & Alton or the New Haven or other roads which might be mentioned, but I remind you that the electric light and power business is the coming public-utility business of the country, and the time has come when the Congress should have the facts asked for by this resolution, and should have them secured by a committee of its own members.

I have no complaint against the Federal Trade Commission as such; but I know from the reports they have already made that they do not and can not take the interest in this kind of an investigation that Members of the Senate will take when they know that this investigation is being made to get information for legislative purposes, and a vote to send this resolution to the Federal Trade Commission is a vote to kill this investigation.

I read in the newspapers that the Walsh resolution is dead, that the fight has been won against this investigation. Well, maybe that is true; maybe the votes will show that; but I remind you that it will be a barren victory, and this resolution or another resolution like it will come again at a time when the public demand is far greater than it is to-day, because of the abuses in the meantime which will make it necessary.

You can not shut out the light from a business that is financing itself as the public-utility electric light and power business is doing to-day, paying two and three times the value of these little power plants in order to issue bonds and securities to the American investor. So when you remember that electricity to-day is used in 14,000,000 out of 26,000,000 American homes, and that every day the use of electricity is increasing, when you remember that wherever there is a municipally owned light and power plant in competition with a privately owned plant rates are forced down to a basis below what they are where they do not have that competition, the question naturally arises, Why? The answer is to be found in large part in the watered securities that are being floated on the investment markets of this country to-day.

I criticize no one for his views or his vote on this measure. I assume that every Senator is as honest in his purpose as I can be. I say to you in all frankness, however, that a vote on this measure is a vote in the interest of the great money power of the country or it is a vote in the interest of the great masses of the people of this country. The American people may not understand all the details and differences about the Federal Trade Commission and the Senate committee, but they do understand that Wall Street and the money power is on one side of this fight and the interest of the great masses of the people is on the other side.

So far as I am concerned, I propose to be on the side of what I believe to be the interest of the great masses consuming electric light and power in this country and the people who are investing their money in these securities on the theory that they are based on sound financing.

It is not so important as to what the so-called big men of the country will say about us. Many of them are big only because they have money. It is not so important what the newspapers will say about us; but it is important whether our action here shall contribute to the benefit of the people as a whole, or whether it shall enable these great financing organizations to go forward with a system that they have already so abused as to arouse the best economists of America to the point of extreme criticism.

No public man should allow himself to be influenced by those who can secure his ear and make their appeal when as a result of that influence his vote will be against the interests of the millions who are struggling in this country to make a livelihood, and who have neither money nor time to come here to plead for their cause.

We owe something—ah, we owe everything—to the millions of people who send us here and expect us to protect their interests when they can not understand what their interests are, or, if they do, can not come here because of lack of finances and time to present their case.

So I say, you may defeat the Walsh resolution; you may beat this investigation, and turn it over to the Federal Trade Commission, and nothing be proven or shown by that investigation, but that will not have ended this controversy. Sooner or later, these facts will come forth. Whether they are to come forth in an investigation in the orderly methods that have been pursued in other investigations and the truth be known before greater wrongs have been committed or whether they are to be further covered up by a half-hearted, friendly, whitewashing investigation and nothing done until the pressure shall come that inevitably will come, makes but little difference in the final result, except as to the people who must pay the bill and those who will lose by their investments in the meantime.

Mr. President, this is only a part of the great struggle which goes on ceaselessly between the forces of conservatism on the one hand and progressivism on the other. There is no party line in this situation. There are Democrats voting one way and Democrats voting another, Republicans voting one way and Republicans voting another.

This resolution, better than anything else that has come into the Senate in many days, will draw the line between those two classes of public men. The public as a whole is about to learn the line-up in this body, and that will be valuable.

Leaders come forward in these fights for progressive measures. They are sometimes called radicals. They are decried against, and they fight on, and after a while they often become conservative in their views and quit fighting. Sometimes they go to work for great organizations of capital at immense salaries. But the people always press on. The people always look for new leaders, and new leaders come. So for the history of a thousand years this struggle of the people for more rights, for fewer privileges by law to those who exploit in the labor of the poor has gone on. This stream of progress has flowed up the slopes of history. It is the only stream in all history that flows upward. It flows up from ignorance toward education; up from slavery toward freedom; up from tyranny toward self-government; up from autocracy toward democracy.

I shall not be surprised if this resolution is defeated, but I shall be glad to have been able to be here and do my part, so far as I can, in what I believe to be the cause of greater social justice and greater human contentment and greater human happiness for the common masses of America. Their uplift, their happiness, their opportunities, their rights affect the world, because to-day the world looks to America as a great example; and this Nation rules the world, not by armies and navies, not by guns and ammunition, but by the silent example of our treatment of the masses of men within our own borders, by which we say to all men everywhere, "If you approve, go thou and do likewise."

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, some one has said that there are two great mainsprings of human action—desire and fear. However, there is a third, possibly more effective because of its continuous action, and that is habit.

Desire and fear actuate individuals spasmodically, but habit is constantly at work. It is like gravity, pulling all the time; and the great obstacle to the advance of civilization is the manner in which humanity clings to habits which are, or have become, irrational.

The people of this country are in the habit of paying excessive prices for electrical energy, a habit of which they are largely unconscious. The result has been enormous profits. These profits in turn have resulted in the pyramiding of the stocks and bonds of our electrical industries, until now we are confronted not merely with unjust electrical rates in this country but with the danger of our investing public putting money into securities based upon the resulting inflated values.

Public regulation has failed to provide just rates and to prevent the distribution of inflated securities. As a result, this investigation has been suggested; and in my opinion it is not only justified but in view of the facts it is the duty of Congress itself to proceed therewith and not delegate it even to the Federal Trade Commission.

What evidence have we that the American people are paying excessive electric-light rates? To demonstrate this fact, I shall compare the rates charged for domestic service in Toronto, Canada, with similar rates charged for service in Birmingham, Ala. Toronto is supplied with electrical energy from Niagara Falls by the Hydroelectric Commission of Ontario, and Toronto municipally distributes the energy which it purchases from the Hydroelectric Commission. The company that distributes electrical energy in Birmingham, Ala., is supplied with electrical energy by the Alabama Power Co. The Alabama Power Co. is a great hydroelectric power enterprise, and the distributing agency in Birmingham is one of its subsidiary companies.

So we have Toronto, Canada, publicly supplied, on the one hand; Birmingham, Ala., privately supplied, on the other. Again, Toronto is about 100 miles from Niagara Falls, the source of its electrical energy. Birmingham is about 100 miles from Muscle Shoals, where the Alabama Power Co. purchases from the Government of the United States electric energy for 2 mills a kilowatt-hour. Similarly, Toronto purchases its energy from a governmental subdivision of Ontario, the Hydroelectric Commission, but they have to pay therefor not 2 mills a kilowatt-hour, but some 2.8 mills per kilowatt-hour at Niagara Falls.

What is the cost of transmission? The Hydroelectric Commission also transmits for Toronto the electrical energy which the city requires from Niagara Falls and adds to the 2.8 mills paid therefor 1.1 mills. In other words, in Toronto, at the switchboard, the city pays 3.9 mills per kilowatt-hour for the electrical energy delivered. It probably does not cost the Alabama Power Co. to exceed 2 mills to transmit the energy which it purchases from our Government at Muscle Shoals to Birmingham, because the distance is practically the same as that from Niagara Falls to Toronto. Therefore we may assume that the energy from Muscle Shoals delivered by the Alabama Power Co. in Birmingham costs the company 4 mills, as against 3.9 mills paid by Toronto for its electrical energy purchased and delivered at its switchboard from Niagara Falls.

Now, let us consider and compare the rates charged for electrical energy in Toronto with those charged in Birmingham. In one case the distributing plant is owned by the public; that is in Toronto. In the other the distributing plant is owned by a private corporation; that is in Birmingham.

In 1926 the average bill for domestic consumption in Toronto was for 94 kilowatt-hours; that is, taking all the bills for electrical energy used domestically in Toronto, dividing the total by the number of domestic consumers, gave a quotient of 94 kilowatt-hours per month. What did the domestic consumer in Toronto pay for that 94 kilowatt-hours? The average bill was $1.63, or at the rate of 1.7 cents a kilowatt-hour.

What did the domestic consumer in Birmingham, Ala., pay in 1926 for 94 kilowatts a month? He paid $7—$1.63 in Toronto; $7 in Birmingham, Ala.

Energy sold by the Government of the United States to the Alabama Power Co. was transmitted, and that portion which reached Birmingham was sold to the domestic consumer for 7.45 cents per kilowatt-hour; but the electrical energy delivered from Niagara Falls to Toronto, about the same distance, by the government of Ontario, or a subdivision thereof, and distributed by the public plant in Toronto, cost the consumer but 1.7 cents—7.45 cents in Birmingham; 1.7 cents in Toronto—both supplied by water power, both owned and controlled by the Government, so far as the hydroelectric development is concerned. Does not this unquestionably demonstrate the fact that the people of this country are paying excessive electric-light rates, inasmuch as the average domestic rate throughout the United States is approximately that of Birmingham?

What evidence is available to the effect that public regulation has failed in this country? In Ontario, Canada, there is a city known as Niagara Falls, located right where electrical energy is developed from the fall of water afforded by the Niagara River. Opposite Niagara Falls, Ontario, is Niagara Falls, N. Y., another city supplied by hydroelectric energy from the same Niagara River. On the Canadian side the city of Niagara Falls is supplied with electrical energy by its own municipal plant, which buys its electrical energy from the Hydroelectric Commission of Ontario.

In 1926 the average bill for electrical energy used in Niagara Falls, Canada, was for 208 kilowatt-hours per month. The charge therefor was $2.54. In Niagara Falls, N. Y., across the river, 208 kilowatt-hours cost about $7.40.

On the Canadian side of the river the domestic consumer paid 1.2 cents per kilowatt-hour, on an average; on the American side of the Niagara River he paid 3.6 cents per kilowatt-hour—three times as much.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Does the junior Senator from Nebraska yield to his colleague?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am wondering if my colleague, in stating the rate in Niagara Falls, N. Y., spoke on the assumption that the Niagara Falls, N. Y., customer consumes as much electricity as the customer on the other side of the river.

Mr. HOWELL. I have used for comparison the average bill in Niagara Falls, Canada, and compared it with the same consumption, 208 kilowatts a month, in Niagara Falls, N. Y.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no figures before me, but it must necessarily follow that the average bill in Niagara Falls, N. Y., is very much smaller than the average bill in Niagara Falls, Canada, because, as the Senator has read, the average bill in Niagara Falls, Canada, is for something over 200 kilowatts a month. That means that a good many of the houses and homes in Niagara Falls, Canada, consume as many as 200 kilowatts in one month.

In the United States that would be an enormous amount of electricity. The ordinary eight-room house will consume from 40 to 50 kilowatts a month. In other words, the ordinary house in Niagara Falls, Canada, will consume about as much electricity as six or seven similar houses in the United States on the average. That is because the rates in Niagara Falls, Canada, are so low, and because electricity is cheap nearly everybody—not everybody, of course, but a very large number of people and homes—do all their cooking, for instance, by electricity and have all the appliances known to modern science, because they can afford them. On this side of the river, where they get the power from the same falls, they can not afford all those things because the rate is so high.

I have forgotten the rate in Niagara Falls, N. Y., but it would not be fair to take the average rate on the Canadian side for over 200 kilowatts a month and use that as a basis to make any figures on the American side, because it would not make the difference appear nearly as great as the difference actually is. In other words, the American consumer, consuming a small amount of electricity for his home, does not get down into the low rates like the Canadian consumer does. I think in Canada the maximum rate is 2 cents a kilowatt-hour and goes down to 1 cent. Can my colleague give me the maximum rate in Niagara Falls, N. Y.?

Mr. HOWELL. The maximum rate is 5 cents.

Mr. NORRIS. How much of that rate can the householder use before it drops, and how far does it drop?

Mr. HOWELL. Five cents per kilowatt-hour for the first 40 hours' use of demand, 4 cents for the next 120 hours, and 1¼ cents for all excess.

Mr. NORRIS. The average householder in Niagara Falls, N. Y., does not get the benefit of the cheap rate because he does not take enough electricity. He will have to pay the maximum rate for all he gets.

Mr. HOWELL. I am comparing a bill for 208 kilowatt-hours a month in Niagara Falls, Canada, with a bill for 208 kilowatt-hours a month in Niagara Falls, N. Y., and the facts are about as I have stated.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt of that, but that is the point I want to call to my colleague's attention. His comparison does not make the showing as favorable to the Canadian consumer of electricity as the real facts are, because the average bill in Niagara Falls, N. Y., is much less, so the American consumer in Niagara Falls, N. Y., is paying a higher rate than my colleague's illustration uses. If he took the real bill or the average bill in Niagara Falls, N. Y., his comparison would be much more illuminating. In other words, in the comparison my colleague has made it does not show up, to the full extent that it should, of the difference between the two rates.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOWELL. In just a moment. As suggested by my colleague, in another form of statement the striking difference would be rendered more apparent. That, I assume, is what my colleague desired to make clear.

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct.

Mr. HOWELL. In Niagara Falls, Canada, the electric distribution plant is owned by the people of that city. The electrical energy is delivered to the distribution system by the hydroelectric commission and the rates quoted are the result. In Niagara Falls, N. Y., the energy is developed by a private corporation from water power obtained from the same Niagara River, but with this difference; it is distributed by a private corporation, subject to regulation by the New York Public Service Commission, and the rates resulting are approximately what I have stated. Does not this comparison demonstrate the failure of public regulation?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator mentioned a moment ago the maximum rate; that is, the initial rate of about 5 cents for the first 40 hours. How does that compare with the initial rate for the first 40 hours on the Canadian side?

Mr. HOWELL. I have not the details of the schedule here; however, on the Canadian side it is much lower.

Mr. SMITH. I think that would come nearer to bringing out the fact which the senior Senator from Nebraska was attempting to develop, that the initial rate is so much on the American side, and I would like to compare it with the similar rate on the Canadian side.

Mr. HOWELL. I can throw some further light on the matter from some data which I have at hand.

Mr. SMITH. I thought perhaps the senior Senator from Nebraska could give us those rates.

Mr. NORRIS. If my colleague will yield, I have those rates in the report of the hydroelectric commission at my office, but not here. Speaking from memory and from my knowledge of cities of the size of those in Ontario, Canada, I think I can tell the Senator. I may be wrong. I think it is 2 cents.

Mr. SMITH. As compared with 5 cents on the American side?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HOWELL. I can throw further light upon the matter with the data which I have in hand. Let us consider a smaller bill. Sarnia is a city 170 miles distant from Niagara Falls. Its electric energy is delivered to Sarnia by the Hydroelectric Commission. Assuming that it costs 2.8 mills per kilowatt-hour at Niagara Falls, the city pays 3 mills for transmitting the energy to the switchboard in Sarnia, or a total of 5.8 mills. In Sarnia, a town of but 16,000 inhabitants, 81 kilowatts a month is the average bill, and the charge therefor is only $1.69, or at the rate of 2.1 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. NORRIS. Is not my colleague wrong on the rate there? Will he give those figures again?

Mr. HOWELL. The charge for 81 kilowatts in Sarnia is $1.69, or at the rate of 2.1 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. SMITH. That charge includes the transmission?

Mr. HOWELL. That is the charge the consumer pays. I am assuming the cost of the electric energy at Niagara Falls at 2.8 mills. The charge for transmission on that basis is 3 mills, making the total cost at Sarnia, 170 miles distant, 5.8 mills. Sarnia then proceeds to distribute its energy and collects from the domestic consumer as an average 2.1 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. For my information, will the Senator state, when the comparison is made between the rates in Canada and in the United States if the same charge is made for taxes, interest, and depreciation on the Canadian plant as is made against the cost of operation of the American plant?

Mr. HOWELL. The charge on account of capital is the rate which the publicly created hydroelectric commission has to pay for money, and I presume that it is from 4 to 4½ per cent. The hydroelectric commission does not pay and the distributing plants do not pay taxes. But what ought we to add for taxes? In the city of Washington the amount to be added for every kilowatt-hour sold by the Potomac Electric Power Co. to make up for what they pay in taxes is 3 mills per kilowatt-hour. Suppose we add 3 mills to the rates to which I have referred. In the case of Sarnia the rates, instead of being 2.1 cents per kilowatt-hour, would be 2.4 cents.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to his colleague?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am induced to ask my colleague permission to interrupt him on account of the question the Senator from New York propounded, and a very proper question, I think. My colleague has answered it so far as the facts are concerned, but there is another thing in these rates which has not been referred to. The Canadian rates which my colleague gives for Niagara Falls, Canada, and for Sarnia, being a town just across the river from Port Huron, Mich., include an item that is not included in any of the items on the American side, and that is an amortization fee which in 30 years will pay off the entire investment. There is no such fee on this side of the line because the investment is never paid off and the consumer continues to pay, and it goes on, like the brook, forever.

Mr. COPELAND. If the junior Senator from Nebraska will permit me to reply to what has just been said by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I desire to say that I was impressed by what occurred in Rochester a little while ago. I had occasion to speak there and I emphasized the difference in price between the charge made per kilowatt in Ontario and the charge made in Buffalo or Niagara Falls. Then I said, "By the way, what is the charge made here in Rochester?" I was told it was 3½ cents a kilowatt-hour; so there was not much difference.

Mr. NORRIS There ought to be no difference. If the theory of those who are opposed to the Canadian system is right, and we are getting cheaper rates here, of course, the rates in Rochester ought to be very much less than they are in Canada. As a matter of fact, they are not, as everybody knows who has inquired.

Mr. COPELAND. What does the junior Senator from Nebraska say?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, allow me to read from the National Electric Light Association rate book of 1927.

Mr. NORRIS. Now we shall see what is paid in Rochester.

Mr. HOWELL. I quote Rochester Gas & Electric Corporation:

Energy generated by steam and water, also purchased.

Population, 321,000: Residence lighting and power, availability; lighting and incidental power where demand is not over 7.5 kilowatts, on straight line meter, 8 cents a kilowatt-hour.

Mr. COPELAND. Now read the remainder of it.

Mr. HOWELL. I continue:

Delayed payment penalty—

They do not reduce the bill for prompt payment——

Mr. NORRIS. They add to it.

Mr. HOWELL (continuing):

Delayed payment penalty, 10 days, 10 per cent first $5 of bill, 2 per cent excess.

Mr. COPELAND. What is the rate in the case when larger quantities are used than in the ordinary home?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I will say that the remaining rate data covers about two pages of the handbook.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, all I know is the reply which was made to me, that the charge was 3½ cents per kilowatt. That took my argument out of doors.

Mr. HOWELL. Unless one is very familiar with rates and facts in such connections, electric-light officials will make statements which, though possibly technically correct, will conceal rather than reveal the facts and thus confuse rather than enlighten.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to inquire of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] for what use was the rate of 3½ cents per kilowatt charged?

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, I was making the ordinary speech that one makes when he wants to emphasize the importance of conserving electric power for the people, and I used the figures that I have heard the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], as well as the distinguished junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], give in comparing the rates between Niagara Falls, Ontario, and Niagara Falls, N. Y. I expected when I asked the question, "What do you pay?" for them to say about 10 cents, but I was taken out of court at once when the reply was 3½ cents.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. For what purpose?

Mr. COPELAND. For domestic use.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the official rate book of the Electric Light Association. I am sorry I have not worked out the rates for Rochester. The facts I have presented, in my comparison of the charges for electrical energy in Niagara Falls, Canada, and those of Niagara Falls, N. Y., in one case regulated by virtue of public ownership, the other by a public service commission, must clearly indicate a failure of regulation, or at least they indicate the tremendous price the people of the United States are paying notwithstanding and in spite of regulation.

Mr. President, here we have Niagara Falls on one hand and Muscle Shoals on the other, the Canadian Niagara Falls development publicly owned and operated. Muscle Shoals owned publicly also, but not utilized as in the case of the Canadian development that is distributed by transmission lines to neighboring cities. As a result we find that Birmingham is paying more for its electrical energy than is the city of Omaha, Nebr., which is supplied not by water power but by a privately owned steam plant under circumstances such as slack coal $4.50 a ton. The maximum net rate in Birmingham is 7.45 cents, while in Omaha the maximum is 5.5 cents. Why this difference; Birmingham is supplied by water power, Omaha by steam, both are privately owned? The Omaha electric-light plant was threatened with public competition, and it voluntarily reduced its rate from 14 cents a kilowatt-hour in 1912 to 6 cents in 1917, right in the midst of the World War; and since then it has reduced the net rate another half cent.

Mr. President, if the Government of the United States will do at Muscle Shoals what the people of Ontario have done with their share of the water power at Niagara Falls, all the territory within 250 miles of Muscle Shoals can be supplied with energy from that plant and the cost of light and power tremendously reduced.

Let us consider what are the rates in the territory within 250 miles of Muscle Shoals. Remember the Government is now selling energy at Muscle Shoals to the Alabama Power Co. for two-tenths of a cent a kilowatt-hour. Nashville, Tenn., is only 110 miles distant. It is a city of 137,000 population; but what do its citizens pay for the use in their homes of 94 kilowatt-hours a month? Ninety-four kilowatt-hours cost in Nashville $8.46, while in Toronto, Canada, 90 miles from Niagara Falls, a distance only 20 miles less than the distance from Nashville to Muscle Shoals, consumers pay for 94 kilowatt-hours $1.63. Here we have $8.46, as against $1.63, for an identical service.

Some one may ask, "Do you not know that the energy supplied in Nashville may be largely generated by steam power?" Mr. President, the Potomac Electric Power Co., of this city, is developing electrical energy and putting it on the switchboard at a cost of not to exceed seven-tenths of a cent a kilowatt-hour—7 mills per kilowatt-hour. Toronto, Canada, has to pay about 3.9 mills a kilowatt-hour for the energy at its switchboard. So, if the electrical energy in Nashville is supplied by a steam plant, if it is an efficient plant, the energy on the switchboard only costs about 3 mills more than transmitted energy in Toronto. The fact, therefore, that in Nashville electrical energy is supplied by a steam plant can not account for the difference between the rate charged to the domestic consumer in Nashville, namely, 9 cents per kilowatt-hour, and the rate charged in Toronto, which is 1.7 cents per kilowatt-hour.

If the Government of the United States will continue to operate Muscle Shoals, not sell the power generated there to the Alabama Power Co. for 2 mills a kilowatt-hour, but expend an additional $5,000,000 installing transmission lines, we will be, so far as Muscle Shoals is concerned, practically in the same situation as Ontario, with reference to water power generated at Niagara Falls and elsewhere, under the control of the Hydro-electric Commission, and at the same time afford rates to the surrounding cities comparable to those enjoyed by the municipalities of Ontario. There are 384 of them, if I remember aright, that are enjoying these advantages, and if I am not mistaken there are not more than three cities in all Ontario in which there are privately owned plants, and in each there are competing public installations.

Consider Memphis, Tenn. It is only 140 miles from Muscle Shoals. Windsor, Ontario, is 215 miles from Niagara Falls. Compare the rates charged in Windsor with the rates charged in Memphis. Ninety-four kilowatt-hours per month costs in Memphis $5.34, but in Windsor 94 kilowatt-hours costs but $1.88.

Mr. President, consider what we could do for the people of this country if we would use Muscle Shoals as an example. That is what the opponents of this investigation fear. They fear that by the adoption of this resolution we will begin to pull out the pillars from under this tremendous capitalization of electrical industries that is swelling every day.

As further evidence of the failure of public regulation, consider the following facts, based on 1925 statistics, afforded for the following cities: The net bill for a consumption of 40 kilowatts per month, furnished by privately owned companies, not by publicly owned enterprises. These privately owned utilities are subject to public competition, either actual or potential.

The data I will now read are some that I have previously prepared.

In Hagerstown, Md., a city of 30,000 inhabitants, the privately owned company utilizes a steam plant, and its charge for 40 kilowatts a month is $2.20.

In Jamestown, N. Y., a city of 39,000 inhabitants, supplied by both water and steam power, the rate for 40 kilowatts per month is $2.

In Lincoln, Nebr., a city of 59,000 inhabitants, they use steam power only. The rate for 40 kilowatts per month is $2.10.

In Springfield, Ohio, a city of some 62,000 inhabitants, steam power only is used. The charge for 40 kilowatts is $2.10.

In Omaha, Nebr., a city of 215,000 inhabitants, steam only is used for the development of energy. In that city they have not had actual competition, but there has been potential competition, and the private company charges $2.20 for 40 kilowatts a month.

In Cleveland, Ohio, a city of 800,000 inhabitants, steam only is used. There is actual competition by the public, and the rate charged by the private company is $2 for 40 kilowatts a month.

The average charge in these six cities for 40 kilowatts per month afforded by privately owned electric-light plants in competition with publicly owned plants is $2.10.

The corresponding charges of the publicly owned plants are not at hand. I am not quoting rates of publicly owned plants; I am quoting rates of privately owned plants, except in the case of Cleveland. There the charge for 40 kilowatt-hours per month by the publicly owned plant is $1.20, the power utilized being steam.

In other words, since 1914 part of the city of Cleveland has been supplied with electrical energy at a maximum rate of not to exceed 3 cents a kilowatt-hour, and the plant is successfully operating to-day. The consequence is that the privately owned Cleveland electric-light plant that formerly charged 10 cents a kilowatt-hour reduced its rates voluntarily to 5 cents a kilowatt-hour, although the courts and the public-service commission of Ohio had held that it was entitled to 10 cents, that a lower rate would be confiscatory.

The following table compares on a percentage basis this six city average and the charge of the Cleveland municipal plant with similar charges in a number of cities throughout the country, all subject to legal regulation.

In Bessemer, Ala., supplied by water power, afforded by the Alabama Power Co., the rate for 40 kilowatts was 45 per cent higher than the six city average, and 155 per cent higher than the rate of the municipal plant in Cleveland.

In Birmingham, Ala., supplied by the Alabama Power Co., using water power, the rate was 46 per cent higher than the six city average rate, and 155 per cent higher than in the case of Cleveland.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. In the case of Birmingham, was the rate regulated?

Mr. HOWELL. I understand that it is regulated by the Public Service Commission of Alabama.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator refers to the six city rates. Are those rates regulated?

Mr. HOWELL. The rates of the privately owned companies are regulated. There are public-service commissions in all of the States within which the six cities are located, except the State of Nebraska.

Mr. GEORGE. What I wanted to know was, What was the difference between Birmingham and the six cities to which the Senator is referring? Are the plants in the six cities all publicly owned?

Mr. HOWELL. No; the average rate I have quoted for the six cities——

Mr. GEORGE. I am just trying to get the basis.

Mr. HOWELL. Just a moment. The average rate I am quoting for the six cities is the average charged by privately owned plants in those cities where regulation is not necessarily by a public-service commission but through and because of public competition.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, I see. The Senator means where the municipality itself has a plant?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes. In other words, the rates in these six cities are not the rates of the publicly owned plants. I am simply quoting the rates of the privately owned plants in each case.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand. Now, as I understand, the single city that the Senator first selects is one where there is regulation merely by a commission?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. The six cities are where there may be regulation by commission plus competition of the municipally owned plant?

Mr. HOWELL. That is true.

Mr. GEORGE. And then the other plant is one that is municipally owned outright?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. So that the Senator's investigation leads him to the belief, of course, that if the mere matter of rate is to control it is better to have public ownership of all these utilities?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, for a number of years I have advocated public competition. As an example, in Omaha we secured authority to build ice plants. The rate for delivered ice had been raised from 50 cents to 70 and 80 cents. This was in the midst of the war. We installed ice plants. The result was that immediately, as soon as we began operating, the rate for delivered ice dropped back to 50 cents.

The rate for cash-and-carry ice dropped to 30 cents. Although we could produce but a third of the ice used in the city of Omaha, at 30 cents per 100 pounds, the rate at which we sold to the public, the proceeds of the sale of the ice produced enabled us in seven years to pay off the $700,000 invested in the plants, so that they are to-day "velvet," as it were, so far as the people of the city of Omaha are concerned.

Mr. President, it was our position from the beginning that we did not want to do all the ice business in the city of Omaha. Merely sufficient to regulate rates. In my opinion, public competition is decidedly more advantageous and safer than public monopoly. Public competition could keep the privately owned ice plants good, and they would necessarily keep the publicly owned plants on their toes or they would go out of existence. That has been the result. I am for public competition, not public monopoly. I am for public competition so far as Muscle Shoals is concerned, because if the Government of the United States will operate Muscle Shoals and build transmission lines, deliver energy to the various cities throughout that territory, I know what the result will be. I might here tell the distinguished Senator from Georgia what the result would be in his city of Atlanta.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator to answer my question.

Mr. HOWELL. In just a moment I will yield.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator does not want to yield——

Mr. HOWELL. I will be delighted to yield, if the Senator will allow me to finish. Never mind; I will yield now and take up Atlanta later.

Mr. GEORGE. I merely wanted to know if the Senator's position was the same as respects the country as that illustrated by the ownership of the ice plants. Is it the Senator's theory, then, that the only effective way—the Senator disclaiming Government ownership of all utilities—is to sprinkle about all over the country some publicly owned utilities, so that the competition plus the regulation may bring about the rate? I want to get the Senator's position, that is all.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the Senator has not been present while I have been discussing this matter, and therefore I will take the liberty of stating an outline of my position.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Of course, the position of the junior Senator from Nebraska is important, but there are others of us in the Senate who have not had the opportunity or the information or the industry to make the investigation which evidently has been made by him. How are we to ascertain, how are we to take positions unless we shall have an impartial investigation of these matters and ascertain the facts?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, that was what I proposed now to state. I have pointed out that the people of this country were paying excessive electric rates. I think I have demonstrated the fact. I have further pointed out and indicated that public regulation has failed, and as a result of that failure and these tremendous rates there has been a pyramiding of capital issues in connection with electric light and power industry.

Inasmuch as regulation has failed, and people are in the habit of paying these high rates, there is only one way to rectify the situation; that is, by agitation, by such an investigation as this, to bring knowledge of these facts to the country. By an investigation of this kind we will also warn investors that they are liable to find themselves buying securities whose issuance is justified only upon the theory that our people will continue to pay these excessive electric rates.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has called attention to the difference between the rates in the United States and the Province of Ontario, Canada. That has been a controverted question in this floor for a long time. It is asserted, for instance, that there appears to be a lesser rate charged in Canada because the energy is developed by a public institution that does not pay any taxes. It is asserted that the rates are higher for domestic service in this country, but that the rates are lower for industrial service. It is said that the Government of Canada is obliged to make up a deficit every once in a while. On the other hand, all these things are denied and controverted. Why should we not have an investigation to find out what the truth about the matter is, so that the Senate can be advised by its own committee?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it was about three or four years ago when the subject of the rates in Canada was first brought to the attention of the Senate, and these rates were then quoted as being the rates paid in Canada. At that time I had a complete statement, and I have just sent to my office to see if I could locate the papers so as to state just what the examination in Canada demonstrated beyond the question of a doubt. Even if any institution here wanted to furnish electric power at the same rates at which they are furnished in Canada, and could have the Government make up any deficit in the same way the deficits are made up in Canada, I do not think the Senator would approve of that.

I did not know this subject was coming up, but if I can locate the papers I will call the Senator's attention to the result of the investigation that was made. I assure him that if the sworn statements of the investigators, both Canadian and American, are correct, there is no such rate made in Canada to justify the statements made.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How are we ever to know what the facts are unless an investigation is conducted by the Senate and a committee of the Senate reports to the Senate the truth about the matter?

Mr. SMOOT. I heard over the radio last night the figures now quoted, and it was pointed out that those rates were possible because of Government ownership, and that such rates could be given to institutions and individuals of this country. I want to say to the Senator frankly that when this matter came up, I think three or four years ago, the same figures were quoted, and after an investigation in Canada it was demonstrated that they were not made up on any basis on which an institution in this country could or would operate, and no deficit could be made up unless it came from the investment of the company, and if the plant was operated by the United States, the same as deficits have been made up in Canada, some provision would have to be made to make up deficits, or if it was an individual company it could not operate very long without bankruptcy.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I will ask the distinguished Senator from Utah what he has to say respecting the electric-light plant in Cleveland, publicly owned, which for the last 14 years has been furnishing electrical energy at a maximum rate of not to exceed 3 cents a kilowatt-hour?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not made any investigation of that, and I would not want to make any kind of a statement until I had made some investigation. But 3 cents is quite different from 1.78 cents. There is a great difference. In fact, it is nearly twice as much, and, as I understand now, there are many of the companies in the United States furnishing energy for power purposes at 3 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. HOWELL. I am not talking about power; the power rate is very much lower in Cleveland.

Mr. SMOOT. Very much.

Mr. HOWELL. I am talking about the maximum rate charged the small consumer.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I can not make the statement offhand, because it would be simply a guess on my part.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can furnish the Senator the exact information from the city of Cleveland. The Senator from New York, if he will give me his attention a moment, told about rates in Niagara Falls. The average rate in Cleveland is just a little less than 2 cents a kilowatt-hour.

Mr. SMOOT. That is for power and light both.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Power and light both; as against something over 7 cents for the entire United States.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Utah as to the statement I made in the course of my remarks yesterday that the farmer in Wisconsin is paying at the rate of 28.4 cents per kilowatt-hour for the first 25 kilowatt-hours.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the Senator make the statement, I will say, and I can not comment on it.

Mr. BLAINE. I was wondering whether the Senator disputed that statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not dispute it. This is the first time I have heard the statement.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator had been here yesterday he would have heard it.

Mr. SMOOT. Unfortunately, then, I will say to the Senator, I was not in the Chamber when he made the statement.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me inquire further of the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. But if 28 cents per kilowatt-hour is the rate the farmer pays in Wisconsin, I will say that I know of no such rate anywhere else in the United States outside of Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. It prevails.

Mr. SMOOT. I say that I know of no such rate, and I never heard of any such rate prevailing anywhere outside of Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. Does such a high rate prevail in Canada?

Mr. SMOOT. No; and I do not think any such rate prevails in the United States outside of Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. I would be very glad to furnish the Senator the information, and I think if he will analyze the rates he will find——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Montana just said that, taking everything into consideration, the average rate for the whole country was only 7 cents. I have never heard such a rate mentioned before as that given by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I now take the liberty of calling the attention of the distinguished Senator from Georgia to the rates for electrical energy in his State, at least in Atlanta. Electrical energy in Atlanta is furnished by water power. In Atlanta a domestic consumer using 94 kilowatt-hours a month pays $7.61, or at the rate of 8.1 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. GEORGE. Upon what date are the Senator's figures based?

Mr. HOWELL. They are from the 1927 rate book.

Mr. GEORGE. At what time?

Mr. HOWELL. I do not know the month the volume was issued.

Mr. GEORGE. Has the Senator investigated to see whether the utilities commission has reduced the rate since that time?

Mr. HOWELL. I have not; but I dare say there has been no reduction in the rate since the issuance of this volume. I will ask the Senator if he knows whether there has been a reduction made in the Atlanta rate.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know, but I had the impression that there was a proceeding before the utilities commission relating to the rate. I do not know when the last rate was fixed.

Mr. HOWELL. I am not surprised that there should be a proceeding before the utilities commission in Georgia respecting the rate charged in Atlanta. Atlanta is a city of 228,000 people. It is about the size of the city of Omaha.

Mr. GEORGE. From what census is the Senator now quoting? Atlanta has a greater population than that. I want to be certain that we are just to Atlanta.

Mr. HOWELL. I am quoting from the 1927 rate book of the National Electric Light Association.

Mr. GEORGE. Atlanta has a larger population than that, I will say to the Senator, at least, but I do not know when the last rate regulation went into effect relating to domestic rates.

Mr. HOWELL. According to the population reported by the rate book in question Atlanta and the city of Omaha are about the same size. Atlanta has the advantage of hydroelectric power. Omaha has not that advantage. Omaha's electric energy must be supplied by steam. Ninety-four kilowatt-hours, as I have previously stated, costs in Atlanta under the schedule set forth in the 1927 rate book $7.61, or at the rate of 8.1 cents per kilowatt-hour. In Omaha we have developed a public-ownership spirit. We acquired our water plant in 1912. We built an ice plant in 1919. We acquired the gas plant in 1920. As a consequence, in Omaha 94 kilowatt-hours now cost not $7.61, as in Atlanta, but $5.17.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I believe the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] was diverted while those figures were being read. Perhaps the Senator from Nebraska will be kind enough to read them again.

Mr. HOWELL. Atlanta is within 215 miles of Muscle Shoals. It is within the distance of Windsor, Canada, from Niagara Falls. In Windsor, Canada, 215 miles away from Niagara Falls, 94 kilowatt-hours cost not $7.61, but $1.88 only.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. In just a moment. If Muscle Shoals were utilized as Niagara Falls has been utilized by Ontario, Atlanta could have the advantage of the same low rate that Windsor enjoys at the present time, and this investigation is necessary to bring such facts to the people of Georgia and the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly. Now, will the Senator let me ask him a few questions?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Where does Windsor, Canada, get its current?

Mr. HOWELL. From Niagara Falls.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it publicly or privately owned?

Mr. HOWELL. The distribution plant is publicly owned.

Mr. GEORGE. That is, owned by the Dominion?

Mr. HOWELL. It is owned by the city. The power stations and the transmission lines are owned by the hydroelectric commission representing Ontario.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator committed himself to the proposition that this investigation is needed and necessary in order to get the facts. I agree with the Senator. There is but one legitimate object of the investigation and it must result either in the bolstering up of the demand for the Government ownership of the utilities of the country or in the regulation of those utilities. That regulation itself is certainly the hope of many who speak as frankly as the Senator who now occupies the floor, and will result ultimately in the ownership of those utilities.

Mr. HOWELL. If the distinguished Senator from Georgia takes the position that the only way we can have lower electric rates in the United States is through public ownership, and that this proposed investigation will result in public ownership, then I am for this investigation and public ownership, not as an end but as a means to an end. Wherein we differ is this: I am not afraid of public ownership.

Mr. GEORGE. Why does the Senator insist on comparing the rate of a private company with the rate of a Government-owned company, and why does the Senator from Montana especially direct my attention to that fact? The Senator from Nebraska followed his statement by the unequivocal statement that, therefore, it is necessary to have an investigation in order to get the facts, in order to enable intelligent action.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I do not want to be discourteous. I have yielded upon every occasion when requested; however, I would like the opportunity now of finishing my statement before I yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield further.

Mr. HOWELL. I will state again that I am not for public ownership as an end. I do not believe in public ownership as an end. I am for public ownership as a means to an end. If we can not accomplish for the people of the country fair and just rates except by resorting to public ownership, I am not afraid of public ownership. I will not throw up my hands. I will fight and fight with public ownership if necessary. I am fearful the distinguished Senator from Georgia is so afraid of public ownership that he is not willing to fight with the means at hand.

Now, let me reiterate that if Muscle Shoals, which belongs to the Government of the United States, were fearlessly taken hold of by Congress, a board of directors appointed to manage it, and supplied with $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 with which to extend transmission lines to various municipalities in its territory, inviting them to put in competing electric-light plants, the city of Atlanta could enjoy as low rates, in my opinion, as those enjoyed by Toronto, or, at least, by Windsor, Canada.

As I said, 94 kilowatt-hours in Windsor cost $1.88, or 2 cents per kilowatt-hour, whereas in Atlanta, Ga., controlled by a privately owned corporation, regulated by a public-service commission, the rate to the domestic consumer is 8.1 cents, or, for a bill of 94 kilowatt-hours, is $7.61.

Mr. President, again I state that the people of the country have the habit of paying enormous electric-light rates. The profits have been correspondingly great. The owners of the electric plants have been trying to perpetuate those profits by capitalizing the companies on the basis of those enormous earnings. They are selling their stocks and bonds throughout the country, hoping that they will secure a large enough clientele to oppose successfully any change in the present situation.

The time has come when the public should act. The State legislatures and the Congress are the only vehicles through which justice can be secured. But in order to obtain action by legislatures and action by the Congress it is necessary to arouse the people of the country, educate them. Whatever may be the view of anyone else respecting the pending resolution, in my opinion its value for that purpose will be enormous. This hoped for effect will be largely defeated, in my opinion, if the investigation is made by the Federal Trade Commission. We ought to fight with the weapons we have at hand to do justice to all the people of the United States.

Mr. President, I will ask permission to include in the RECORD certain statistics prepared by myself which I began to read and did not finish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum of statistics is as follows:

EFFICIENCY OF COMPETITION

The electric light and power industry affords excellent illustrations of the efficiency of public competition as compared with legal regulation. For the purposes of comparison in this connection, consider a net lighting bill of 40 kilowatt-hours per month. In the following cities the charges for this consumption by the privately owned plants, subject to actual or potential competition, are as follows, viz:

City	Population	Power utilized	Competition	40 kilowatt-hours per month
Hagerstown, Md	30,000	Steam	Actual	$2.20
Jamestown, N. Y	39,000	(?)	do	2.00
Lincoln, Nebr	59,000	Steam	do	2.10
Springfield, Ill	62,000	do	do	2.10
Omaha, Nebr	200,000	do	Potential	2.20
Cleveland, Ohio	800,000	do	Actual	2.00
Six city average				2.10

Thus the average charge for 40 kilowatt-hours per month by the privately owned plants in these six cities regulated by public competition is $2.10.

The corresponding charges of the publicly owned plants are not at hand except in the case of Cleveland. There the charge for 40 kilowatt-hours per month is $1.20, the power utilized being steam.

The following table compares on a percentage basis this "six-city average," and the charge of the Cleveland municipal plant with similar charges in a number of cities throughout the country all subject to legal regulation only:

[1] "Steam and water" indicates water power is used as an auxiliary. "Water and steam" indicates steam power is used as an auxiliary.

[2] Average for 9 companies.

These data, collected from cities widely scattered and with greatly varying populations, utilizing both steam and water power, certainly indicate that there is something the matter with legal regulation. They also testify to the efficiency of regulation by public competition, and the remarkable possibilities of a well-managed, steam-operated, public enterprise in the electrical field.

Incidentally it may be properly inferred also that water power in the hands of private interests means little to the public, a fact that has animated those who have bitterly opposed the leasing of the great power at Muscle Shoals, constructed at enormous expense with public funds.

Of course, it may be urged that the rates in the six cities enjoying public competition are not compensatory. However, they have been in effect for a considerable time; and, moreover, one of these cities, Omaha, enjoys this low rate not because of actual competition but because of potential competition; that is, fear of public competition. In other words, the private company operating in Omaha, realizing it must afford reasonable rates or be confronted with public competition, voluntarily acquiesced in the rate quoted for that city, to the end of avoiding public competition. Certainly no public-utility corporation would agree to a noncompensatory rate as a result of a mere threat.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. I have been wondering if the Senator from Montana will let us see if we can fix a time for a vote. The debate has been running along now for three days, and it is desired very much that we shall bring it to a close.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the debate is coming to a close.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator believes the debate is coming to a close?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator thought so on Monday.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I suggest that speeches from now on be limited to 30 minutes? Senators who have indicated that they want to talk have stated they will not take over 20 minutes. If we limit the speeches to half an hour, we can undoubtedly bring the debate to a close this afternoon.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I hope I may have the privilege of closing the debate, and I would not want to agree to that.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator from Montana think the debate will be concluded by 5 o'clock this afternoon?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would think so. Senators who are to talk have assured me that they will speak only briefly.

Mr. WATSON. I am being greatly pressed all the while by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], chairman of the Finance Committee, to conclude the matter so that he may have the Senate proceed with the consideration of the alien property bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to express the hope that we may vote on the pending resolution to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there can be no doubt of the importance of conserving for posterity the great water powers of America. As time goes on, hydroelectric development is bound to be the one feature which will make life comfortable for those who come after us. If there is one thing I honor the great governor of my State for, it is the fight he has made to preserve the water powers of New York for the people. I venture to say that the waters from Niagara Falls to the Canadian line and all the rivers of our preserves in New York State will be saved for the people. He has set out on his fight to insist upon it that those water powers and hydroelectric developments should be had by the people of New York.

There can be no difference of opinion among us regarding the importance of the subject. But I heard yesterday with amazement the address made by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I felt still greater amazement as I read his speech this morning in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It seems to me—and I say it in all kindness and courtesy—that the distinguished Senator has strayed away from his usual bent of mind regarding a matter of this sort. In his address yesterday he made a very bitter attack upon Mr. Humphrey, a member of the commission, and it seemed to me then, and it does now, that he has confused in his mind the attitude of Commissioner Humphrey as against the attitude of the Federal Trade Commission.

I have no brief for Mr. Humphrey. Nobody knows that better than does the Senator from Nebraska. I was one of the 10 Members of the Senate to vote against the confirmation of Mr. Humphrey; I was one of the four Democrats who voted against him; but there are other men upon the commission, and I think it would be a very great pity, indeed, to let the impression go out that we have a commission made up of men who are unworthy of our confidence.

I have here a list of the members of the Federal Trade Commission, and I will ask the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] as to one of them. Garland S. Ferguson, jr., a Democrat, from Greensboro, N. C., a great lawyer, who was a referee in bankruptcy. Is he looked upon, I will ask the Senator from North Carolina, as a capable and honest man?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have no hesitation in replying in the affirmative to the Senator's inquiry. Mr. Ferguson was appointed upon the indorsement and approval of both my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] and myself, and of almost the entire bar in the section of the State of North Carolina, in which he has resided. He comes from one of the most distinguished families of North Carolina. Its members have been distinguished as great judges and great lawyers. His father was for twenty-odd years a great judge of the superior court. Mr. Ferguson himself has been a practicing attorney for many years in North Carolina. He is a brother of the great shipbuilder Ferguson, and his reputation as a lawyer and as a man is equal to that of anybody whom I know in my State.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is not an uncommon thing for a man who has not very much of an argument otherwise to set up a straw man and then knock him down. I am sure the Senator from New York will be unable to point to a single Member of the Senate who has in any wise questioned either the integrity or the ability of Mr. Ferguson. Perhaps we can proceed upon that assumption. Eulogies have been pronounced upon Judge McCulloch, another member of the commission. I have a very pleasant acquaintance with him; we are neighbors. He is a delightful gentleman, and I have no doubt in the world a very honorable gentleman and an excellent lawyer. Why waste time to tell about the virtues of these two gentlemen?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana referred to a straw man that is set up to be knocked down. In this instance I assume that I am the straw man who is to be knocked down. However, I think it does have a bearing upon this case and upon what we are going to do with this resolution to know whether we are dealing with a group of men who have or have not integrity, capacity, and ability.

The Senator from Nebraska yesterday excoriated in bitter terms the chairman of the commission, Mr. Humphrey; the Senator from North Carolina has just spoken of Mr. Ferguson; and in spite of the diversion of the Senator from Montana, I am going to venture to ask our distinguished and beloved leader on this side, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], whether Judge McCulloch is a man who may be relied upon?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator from New York desire me to answer his question now?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, Judge E. A. McCulloch was for 20 years prior to his appointment to the Federal Trade Commission a member of the supreme court, the highest judicial tribunal in the State of Arkansas. During the greater part of that time he was the chief justice of that court. He is a great judge, a man of undoubted integrity, and of recognized ability. He is affectionately regarded by the bar and the people of the State of Arkansas.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. I regret that both the Senators from Iowa are absent. If they were here, I should ask them about Mr. Hunt, a Republican from Iowa, who is or was president of the American Farm Bureau Federation of that State, an outstanding citizen, as I understand, and a fair and able man. Mr. Myers we have discussed at great length.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the junior Senator from Montana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Hunt was one of those who voted with Mr. Humphrey to dismember practically or to ruin the effectiveness of the Federal Trade Commission. I am sure the Senator from New York ought to ask somebody else to rise and eulogize Mr. Humphrey and tell the Senate that prior to his going on the commission he was an attorney and a lobbyist for the Lumber Trust, and was the attorney for the Republican National Committee when that organization sent its representatives out to Montana to frame a case against me.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, I will say to the junior Senator from Montana——

Mr. WHEELER. I think somebody ought to get up and eulogize Mr. Humphrey because of his activities in that respect.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator from Montana will have a hard time to find anybody in this Chamber who will eulogize Mr. Humphrey. Certainly I shall not.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am surprised that the Senator is not going to eulogize Mr. Humphrey. I thought the Senator was criticizing me because I did not eulogize him. I do not know that I cast any reflection upon any member of the commission. I think I did not mention any of them by name, except Mr. Humphrey and Mr. Myers, and the only thing I said about Mr. Myers was that he was the gentleman who wrote the opinion of the Attorney General to which reference has been made. I presume he was conscientious in it, but that opinion took away from the Federal Trade Commission the jurisdiction to investigate a part of the subject matter of the identical resolution before us. The Senator wanted me to remain in the Chamber, as I supposed, while he administered a rebuke to me for what I said about Mr. Humphrey, but I did not say as much against him as the Senator himself has said. I do not think, necessarily at least, the question of the honesty or the integrity or the ability or the patriotism of the members of the commission is involved. The Senator is endeavoring to have evidently a sort of testimonial meeting in the Senate; he has been calling on Members of the Senate for testimony with regard to the character and ability of various members of the Federal Trade Commission and other officials of the Federal Government. That may be entertaining, but I can not understand how that will meet the proposition that the Attorney General has held by an opinion, submitted at the request of the Federal Trade Commission, that the commission has no jurisdiction over at least the subject matter of a portion—in my judgment the most important portion—of the pending resolution. That is my main objection.

Mr. WHEELER. We might resolve the Senate into a mutual admiration society of the members of the commission, might we not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not so sure that I ought to follow the Senator from Nebraska as I did last year, or whenever it was that the confirmation of Mr. Humphrey was under consideration. I heard the Senator say some things then about Mr. Humphrey, and he repeated them yesterday; but he has not excoriated the other members of the commission.

However, it does make a difference what manner of men serve upon the Federal Trade Commission. I take pride in the fact that it was a Democratic administration that gave us the Federal Trade Commission; that is, I did take pride in it until this week.

Mr. WHEELER. And a Republican administration ruined it.

Mr. COPELAND. Now I am told that I must not be proud of it any more because it was ruined by a Republican administration.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to know who told the Senator that he must not be proud of it any longer. I have not heard such a statement.

Mr. COPELAND. The junior Senator from Montana has just told me that it has been ruined by the Republican administration.

Mr. NORRIS. The advice of the Senator from Montana, so far as I have ever come in contact with it, I have found good; but the Senator is under no obligation to follow it unless he wishes to do so.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very much obliged to the Senator; I am glad that I do not have to follow it. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad the Senator has found that out. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I did take pride in the fact that there had been made a part of the Government itself the Federal Trade Commission. I have read, or rather reread, with the greatest interest to-day the message of Woodrow Wilson when he appeared before Congress to urge the establishment of the Federal Trade Commission.

In that message Mr. Wilson referred to the fact that "the business of the country has long waited and has suffered because it could not obtain further and more explicit legislative definition of the policy and meaning of the existing antitrust laws," and so forth.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon a further interruption, I assume he has also read the speeches of Al Smith with reference to the Power Trust in New York, has he not?

Mr. COPELAND. I certainly have, and Mr. Smith did not have to come to the Senate of the United States to secure any legislation to make effective his control of the Power Trust in the State of New York.

Mr. WHEELER. I am assuming that he has opposed the Power Trust in New York, has he not?

Mr. COPELAND. He certainly has, and very effectively so.

Mr. WHEELER. He has been advocating, has he not, some kind of Government ownership of the power units of the St. Lawrence River?

Mr. COPELAND. He has, by the State.

Mr. WHEELER. By the State?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHEELER. And he is doing it, I assume, for the reason that he feels that he ought to have some kind of control over the Power Trust in the State. Let me ask the Senator further if Governor Smith were President of the United States would he follow that same policy?

Mr. COPELAND. I can not say what he would follow if he were President of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. I thought the Senator from New York was the spokesman for Governor Smith here on the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. I wish I were; but I have not that high honor.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana has finished his speech I will go on with mine.

As I was saying, I have taken pride in the fact that the Federal Trade Commission was organized. The bill to create that commission was presented here by a great Democrat, Senator Newlands, of Nevada. The bill was considered by the Congress during a long period of time. The delightful thing about it is that when Mr. Newlands made his report to the Senate he pointed out the fact that the action of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce was thoroughly nonpartisan. As he said, "prominent members of the Republican Party having participated actively in the perfection of the bill." It was a measure which had been given the careful study of prominent Members of the Senate and of the House, and out of it came this important commission.

Now we have reached a point, Mr. President, where we are charged with being controlled by the lobby if we do not vote to have an investigation made by Members of the United States Senate and not by this Federal Trade Commission, which, according to Senators here, is made up of honorable men.

What about the lobby, Mr. President? I read about it, and I hear about it, and I am told about the "high-priced men" who are here in Washington. I must assume that they are here. But, Mr. President, the lobby must regard me as the senior Senator from Montana appears to, merely as a straw man, because I have not been approached by anybody and asked to send this resolution to the Federal Trade Commission. I have been approached by Members of this body, who have appealed to me in the most proper way, the most solicitous way, fearing that I might go wrong, that I might ruin the governor of my State, and he could not be President, and that I could not be reelected to the Senate!

The only persons outside of this body who have approached me have been men who have urged me to vote to adopt the resolution presented by the Senator from Montana. The lobby that I have met, and the only lobby that I have met, has been a lobby seeking to induce me to vote for this resolution, and not against it.

I do not know how other Senators feel about it, but I venture to say that my experience is the experience of every Member of this body. So far as I know, no Member of this body has ever been approached by a member of the so-called lobby. Either there is not any lobby, or else they are not earning their money. At least, so far as I am concerned I have had no contact with them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have on my desk a paper telling of the arrival here in the month of October last of Mr. Josiah T. Newcomb, who I showed was in the employ of the Alabama Power Co. and got $20,000 out of the construction cost of the Mitchell Dam project, who, on his arrival, gave a dinner to the representatives of the press here at one of the expensive clubs of the city of Washington. That was in the month of October last.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, who was that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Josiah T. Newcomb.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we will assume that is all so; but do members of the press control the votes of Senators?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all. They influence public opinion, however, which does control some Senators.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not made and do not intend now to make any charge whatever about anybody on this lobby approaching or influencing any Senator; but the Senator must know that there is now in the city of Washington a great lobby on the water-power proposition.

Mr. COPELAND. I have read it in the newspapers.

Mr. NORRIS. I can cover the Senator up with literature on the subject if I bring it all over here——

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad the Senator is doing it and not some lobbyist.

Mr. NORRIS. But I just happen to have in my desk here a little pamphlet that is going all over the United States, put out, as shown on its face, by this joint committee. I have here a letter containing a whole newspaper page of propaganda sent out by the same committee. This committee, as stated here in print on the front of this little pamphlet that I have, is the joint committee of national utility associations. Its New York office is 420 Lexington Avenue. I understand that this committee has a whole floor down here in Washington. George B. Cortelyou is the chairman of it. Mr. Newcomb, whose name is familiar to most Senators, is one of the managers of it. I have not been there, but I have been told about it by newspaper men; and one newspaper man in particular whom I know, and who is beloved by the Senator from New York, came into my office and told me that he was there, and that they offered to double his salary if he would quit his present clients and go to work for them in the publicity field.

It is not a secret. I think we can mention that without saying that a newspaper lobby is coming here to the Senate and trying to get Senators out and control them. They have more sense than that. These men—who, I presume, draw tremendous salaries and are capable of earning them—would not be so foolish as to meet the Senator from New York on the street and offer him a bribe. That is not the way they get men like the Senator from New York on their side.

Mr. COPELAND. I am so stupid; how do they get them?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is not stupid. The ways, perhaps, are outlined somewhat by the circulation of this pamphlet. If it were material, I would take that pamphlet up and discuss the various things that are contained in it. Some of them are direct, and some of them are indirect.

Mr. COPELAND. Just what is the pamphlet?

Mr. NORRIS. The object of it all is to show that the Government must let this great corporation, this Water Power Trust, alone; it must keep its hands off. The Senator from California at the last session stated on the floor of the Senate that this man Newcomb, one of the men who are running this thing down here, stated the amount of money that they had invested—I have forgotten what the figures were—and stated that they were not going to let Congress legislate on such things as Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam. They do not want anything of that kind to occur.

If the Senator will pardon me just a moment longer, the statements contained in this pamphlet and the statement here on this sheet, being an editorial by the great newspaper writer, Mr. Brisbane, in themselves no one can find fault with. I have read this statement and I think it is a beautiful and able one. The point is that they use every one of those things in a misleading way. They are converting or trying to convert the rank and file of the people of the United States by this kind of insidious legislative propaganda.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me ask the Senator, is not this statement in favor of the Walsh resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it does not say anything about it, and a great deal in this pamphlet says nothing about it. It does it in an insidious way. It does it in an indirect way. It goes on to show the wonderful possibilities of water-power development. It says nothing about who shall do it; but in their argument in the letter in which they send to you, they say, "These radicals are trying to prevent that kind of thing." It is not true, although, of course, every word of the written language may be true.

I will call the attention of the Senator to a statement in this little pamphlet. I am familiar with most of the things that are mentioned here. They are very shrewd in the way they put it up. If the thing were standing alone, no one would suspect, even, that it was propaganda; and the propaganda that is effective is that kind of stuff, put in in connection with something else that is misleading.

Here is a heading "Two beautiful bridges," and just a paragraph. It goes on and says:

In Potomac Park, Washington, D. C.—

I suppose 90 per cent of the people who get this pamphlet have never been in Potomac Park, have never been in Washington, D. C. If that statement were made outside of the other things that go with it, it would not have any effect anywhere; but then it goes on to tell what they are:

In Potomac Park, Washington, D. C., there are two beautiful parallel bridges, built under exactly the same conditions. The plans for both bridges were prepared by the same engineer, the estimated cost for each bridge was $1,000,000, and the time estimated for completion of each was one year.

One of those bridges was built by private enterprise in less than one year and for less than the estimated cost. The other bridge was built by the United States Army in three and a half years and at a cost of $3,250,000.

What they want to convey there is that everything the Government does is a failure. The Senator and all of us are familiar with Potomac Park, and we know that there is not any such thing there as two parallel bridges just alike. They do not say that they are just alike; but what person who has not been to Washington and reads that will not believe that they are identically the same—two bridges just alike? If you pin them down, technically, they will get out from under that.

I took up the matter with the War Department. I have been here for 25 years every winter. I did not know of any such bridges. I have walked and ridden all over Potomac Park. I did not believe there was such a thing, and of course there is not. The nearest thing to it is a wagon bridge down here, and, a quarter of a mile or so from it, a railroad bridge. They are the only two bridges that can possibly be referred to here; and, of course, nobody can compare those two things and say that the cost ought to be equal, or that one ought to be constructed sooner than another.

I only give that as a sample. These other things are samples, and this book is full of just such stuff.

It may interest the Senator to know that on the last page they rake me up and down because I am a radical, they say. In another place they refer to the electric-light rates in Ontario, and they do not tell a lie, excepting that they tell only part of the truth, which is more deceiving than though the entire thing were manufactured and made out of whole cloth.

That is the kind of propaganda that is going on. It is a shrewd propaganda; and that is the way they get the support of such honest men as the Senator from New York, by influencing public opinion, by influencing and buying newspapers, and writing these misleading editorials and stories and accounts of things that are only partly true.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I think the Senator is entirely wrong when he says that they influence the Senator from New York. Apparently, it is the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] who is doing the influencing here.

Mr. WATSON. No; I will say to my friend that the Senator from Indiana endeavored to head off debate. What I want to do is to get a vote, and I think the best thing to do is to serve notice that we are going to stay here until we do vote.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator from Indiana will sit down, I will finish my speech very soon.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator from New York will agree to sit down in 20 minutes, I will sit down now.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope the Senator from Indiana does not think the Senator from New York is hurting his cause.

Mr. WATSON. Not at all. The Senator from New York always illuminates every cause to which he addresses himself.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator will yield, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, no.

Mr. WHEELER. I am going to suggest the absence of a quorum, because I want the Members of the Senate to hear this illuminating speech and discussion that is going on.

Mr. COPELAND. I will not yield for that purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. COPELAND. For what purpose, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. BLAINE. I want to ask two questions.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well; go ahead.

Mr. BLAINE. I understood the Senator from New York to be asked the question if he was the spokesman for Governor Smith on the floor of the Senate. That question was answered. I want to ask whether the Senator from New York represents the viewpoint and opinion of Governor Smith upon this question?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from New York does not. The Senator from New York can speak for himself only. The convention in Houston will determine the matter the Senator has in mind.

Mr. BLAINE. Then, Mr. President, I have one other question. If the Senator from New York was in the Chamber yesterday, he heard me, in the course of my remarks, describe the report that was made by the Federal Trade Commission in response to the Norris resolution, in the course of which remarks I showed conclusively that all that is contained in the report may be found in public documents which any Member of the Senate may read, or in some of the public documents which any Senator might have acquired, and reports of State utility commissions which any Senator might have obtained; that aside from that, and some periodicals available to everyone, the Federal Trade Commission did not subpœna a single witness, did not swear a single witness, did not cross-examine a single witness. Now, I ask the Senator from New York if he is willing to have another request go to the Federal Trade Commission, with the result that the Federal Trade Commission will impose upon the Senate in the same way they did in making the report to which I refer.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for his comments and his question. I am assuming that the Federal Trade Commission will carry out in detail the investigation which we ask them to make.

Mr. BLAINE. I would like to ask the Senator this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I do not want to be discourteous——

Mr. BLAINE. Just one more question.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator base his assumption upon the past record of the Federal Trade Commission, or upon a hope that he has?

Mr. COPELAND. On both. Now, Mr. President, I want to speak about the Senator from Nebraska for a moment, if he will permit me. Of course, he has described a black lobby. What has he to say about the other kind of a lobby, the "white lobby"?

I have here a lot of stuff written by Mr. Judson King about political lawyers, and here is a release put out, signed by the Anti-Monopoly League, my old friend George L. Record, president, and B. C. Marsh, secretary. It says:

> Senator WALSH'S resolution * * * met a snag in the reactionary Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which Senator JAMES E. WATSON, of Indiana, is chairman.

Then I find in this same indirect appeal to Senators, seeking to influence them, the following:

> Senator NORRIS challenges the sincerity of the Willis-Madden bill on Muscle Shoals.
> "I am proposing to turn it over to you. Why don't you answer my question?" said Senator NORRIS.

Of course, Senators, we were not born yesterday. There will be anti this and pro that. There will be organizations without end that will send out literature. I hope, for the sake of those who send this stuff along, that the Senator from Nebraska reads it more thoroughly than I do. My mail is so filled with legitimate matter that I do not pay much attention to the sort of thing mentioned by the Senator from Nebraska. I prefer to listen to the Senator himself, and when he speaks he does influence me. But certainly the Senator from Nebraska does not believe that Senators here are swayed from the path of duty and that they do wrong things or things which they should not do because of this propaganda. He does not contend that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from New York must not try to convey an idea which I have several times expressly disclaimed. The Senator, while he criticizes what I said yesterday and have said before on this proposition——

Mr. COPELAND. No; I am not criticizing.

Mr. NORRIS. Will have to admit that I have not charged anybody with corruption or dishonesty. I told the Senator how I thought this lobby got such men as the Senator himself. It is the indirect work that has its influence. No man would come up to the Senate and try to buy Senators as you would buy a lot of cattle. He would be in jail before long and could not buy anybody. Even if a man were inclined to sell, he would not sell in that way. That is not the way it is done.

The Senator suggested he was not born yesterday. I suppose he knows that is not the way it is done. But he does know, he certainly must know, of the wonderful influence of publicity through the newspapers and magazines and publications and pamphlets over this country, and he must know that we are influenced by that propaganda indirectly and unconsciously, without knowing it. That is the kind of propaganda that I think is effective and which this lobby is putting out. I have not been down to the headquarters, but I can get the address of the lobby and let the Senator go down and walk through their rooms.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not want it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is not afraid to go down there, is he?

Mr. COPELAND. No; but I do not need to go down there, according to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. No; they do not need to send for the Senator, because for some other reason the Senator agrees with them in what they are trying to do. That is said without any insinuation that the Senator is not just as conscientious as I am. I realize there are two sides to every question.

Mr. COPELAND. Has the Senator been affected by this white lobby, the material he has received?

Mr. NORRIS. No; not that I know of. Maybe I have been and do not know it.

Mr. COPELAND. I wonder if perhaps sometimes this lobbying does not have a negative effect. It so happens that the papers I read take the same view the Senator from Nebraska takes. I have seen great editorials in the papers calling upon Senators to vote the way the Senator from Nebraska is voting. I suppose it is a streak of obstinacy in my nature that makes me, when I read such things, take the opposite view!

Mr. NORRIS. I am sorry that the Senator takes that view, because that demonstrates that he is controlled by a stubbornness that I did not suppose ever possessed him. I thought he was a more reasonable man than that. If that is the Senator's nature, and if that is the way to control the Senator, I will know how to advise any lobbyist who ever wants to get him in the future.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for his facetious remarks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from New York that I thought he was answering the charge which has been broadcast throughout the United States that there was a great lobby here, lobbying with the Senators in the interest of the defeat of this resolution. That charge has been made frequently upon the floor of the Senate.

Everybody understands what is meant when you say that the Senate is being lobbied. You do not by that mean propaganda in the newspapers; you mean individual representatives of these organizations coming here and belaboring Senators in behalf of their view of the question under consideration.

I was very glad to hear the Senator discuss that phase of the matter. If the statement is true, I know nothing about such a lobby. But there is a vast difference between lobbying and propaganda. No man can in this age escape propaganda, both pro and con, unless we abolish the press, abolish the newspapers and magazines, and the other instrumentalities of communication, such as broadcasting by radio. What comes to us through those instrumentalities is propaganda. No man can escape that. No man is to be condemned because he reads the newspapers containing such propaganda. He can not get full information on other matters unless he does read the newspapers. Nobody can charge that if a Senator is influenced by that kind of propaganda he is improperly affected, because that propaganda is indulged in with reference to everything—political candidates, politics, all sorts of industrial schemes and enterprises. There is no way to escape it. But a charge that the Senate is being influenced improperly by lobbyists refers to a thing very different from that. It is upon this latter matter that I would like to hear the Senator further.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. He speaks from long experience in the Congress. No man could fail to condemn a newspaper that was colorless upon great public questions. We expect the great papers of the country to express their views. Every Senator reads the editorial utterances and the newspaper articles, and if he has not character enough to resist the stimulation to any improper method or act on his part by reason of this reading, he is not worthy to be a Senator. On the other hand, every Senator seeks advice wherever he can get it, and seeks knowledge wherever he can get it. It is charged that there is a lobby here somehow or other influencing us. I do not know how; I do not know what the methods are; I have not had contact with them, whether it is by the use of tea or coffee, or cigars, or good dinners, or what not; I do not know. But it is absurd to say that any lobby is controlling the votes of this body.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I believe the charge was that they gave a dinner to some of the newspaper boys, as I understood the Senator from Nebraska, so I presume that was the insidious lobby which corrupted the press. But may I ask the Senator just one question. As I gather from the statement of the Senator from Nebraska, the thing to which he took exception was propaganda, as he called it, against Government ownership, and the development of certain power at Muscle Shoals, for instance. Is it a crime for the men who hewed this country out from the wilderness as individuals to try to perpetuate society as it was, as individualists, and to oppose propaganda that is going the rounds to try to turn over all the activities of society to the Government? Is that a crime?

Mr. COPELAND. I think not.

Mr. CARAWAY. I had not thought so. Perhaps it is because I am impervious to wisdom, but I have felt that a man was not serving America overwell who continuously pounded into the American people that they were failures, that they were incapable of managing their own affairs, that they were too dishonest to be intrusted with their own government, and therefore that they must surrender it all to somebody who sits in the basement of a public building here and parts his hair in the middle and smokes his cigarette out of the left corner of his mouth, who thinks he knows more about how business should be run in Arkansas and Nebraska and New York than the people who made Nebraska and made Arkansas and made New York. It may be that I ought to shut my ears against that propaganda, but it is going the rounds. I still have confidence in the men and women who made America. I still believe that if too much of the hand of Government is taken off of them they will demonstrate that they can be trusted to run their own affairs. I may be misinformed, but that is my position.

While I am speaking of this matter, I want to call attention to what the original resolution provides. Of course, nobody will contend that a resolution has any power to give the Congress the right to investigate that thing which it has not the right to regulate.

The power to regulate gives the power to investigate. That is where we get the investigating power. The resolution calls for an investigation of the election of every officer in America. It does not say so, but that is its purpose.

Former Senator Lodge at one time had the force bill in charge, and of all things that the people hated in my part of the country it was Lodge and the force bill. We felt like he was striking down our very civilization, and yet he only tried to take over and regulate and control the selection of Representatives in Congress and United States Senators. This resolution proposes to delegate the power to investigate, and necessarily carries with it the power to regulate the election of every officer from constable up or down, and those people who at one time denounced Lodge are now supporting that proposition. Oh hear, Shade, my most humble apology!

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. May we return to the opposition of the Senator from Nebraska to the ultimate disposition of the resolution? He laid great emphasis upon page 3 of the Walsh resolution, relating to the expenditure of money through the control of the avenues of publicity to influence or control public opinion on account of municipal or public ownership. That is the great thing the Senator from Nebraska has fought for. I have fought shoulder to shoulder with him many times. But there are many other things in the resolution besides that one.

Here it is provided that the investigating group must inquire into the growth of the capital assets and capital liabilities of public-utility corporations, and the method of issuing stocks and bonds, the price realized or value received, the commissions or bonuses paid or received, the extent to which such holding companies or their stockholders control or are financially interested in financial or other corporations, and the relation of the classes of corporations, the holding companies, and the public-utility corporations.

Why, Mr. President, there is a tremendous amount in this resolution besides the thing fought for by the Senator from Nebraska. I think there is ample in it to require the careful study and consideration of experts. I wonder how any Senator, each one of us with a dozen committees and subcommittees, does his work, especially when he has to live in such air as we have in this Chamber. Then, on top of that, think of the proposition to make an exhaustive study of this great problem, to be made by a Senate committee without the employment of the very experts who would be used by the Federal Trade Commission. It is absurd beyond words.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. If there is to be legislation upon this subject, the Senate of the United States must study it. It has got to make the investigation. Nobody else can make it except the Senate of the United States and the other branch of Congress if there is going to be legislation, and that, so far as I am concerned, is the only feature of it in which I am interested.

Mr. COPELAND. I fear the Senator from Idaho is not fully conversant with the substitute resolution proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. His substitute or amendment, as modified, provides for the investigation by the Federal Trade Commission and that a transcript of the testimony shall be furnished to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; and I undertake to say that no investigation for the purposes of legislation can be carried on successfully or effectively except by the body which intends to legislate.

Mr. COPELAND. But the Senator certainly is not going to contend that this body is going to make the investigation? It must of necessity be made by a small committee, and the body as such, the great group of Senators, will have to make the same study.

Mr. BORAH. It is true that it will be made by a committee in the first instance, but that committee has in mind all the time during the investigation the subject of legislation. It makes the investigation and pursues the subject with the ultimate object of legislating. In my judgment no successful investigation could be made for the purpose of legislation except by some one who has in mind the subject of the legislation.

Mr. COPELAND. May I call the attention of the distinguished Senator to the fact that the resolution itself provides for the study with particular reference to what legislation, if any, should be enacted by Congress to correct any abuses that may exist. That is contemplated in the resolution. There is not a thing, I will say to the Senator, so far as I can judge, in turning this investigation over to the Federal Trade Commission that can possibly do away with the gathering of such material as we will need in formulating legislation.

Mr. BORAH. We have made a good many investigations here of subject matters as to which I was doubtful as to our jurisdiction, but we are all of 15 or 20 years behind with reference to this particular subject in the way of legislation. If there is any subject about which we ought to be informed and about which we will have to be informed and about which we will have to take the trouble to inform ourselves, it is this matter, for the purpose of legislation.

Mr. COPELAND. But the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who has given thought to this matter for years, has formulated in his outline of program exactly what subjects should be followed by those who investigate, and he did it with reference to legislation. That is the purpose of the proposed investigation.

Now, the other matter which excites the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is with reference to the question of whether there is propaganda to defeat public ownership. On that subject, except when we come to natural resources like the powers of great rivers, such as the Tennessee River and the Colorado River, I must part company with the Senator from Nebraska, because I do not believe in public ownership and operation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that regardless of what the Senator believes he must admit, and I know he will admit, that whether the development and distribution of electric power and current should be carried on by privately operated corporations or by municipalities owning the plants of distribution and of generation, there is involved a question of tremendous importance. I care not which side the Senator is on. For the purposes of investigation, for the purpose of ascertaining what is the truth, no matter which side we are on, if we are going to investigate at all, we ought to ask for a fair and honest investigation.

That particular provision in the resolution calls upon the committee to ascertain whether the alleged trust, which is reaching out into every community in the United States, is spending money and using influence for the purpose of controlling means of publicity, like newspapers, and so forth, on that question. The Senator may not agree with me as to whether a municipality should own its electric-light plant and its distributing system; but if there is a contest on and it is claimed that these private corporations are doing what we have described here, such as the private corporations did in California to control an election, spending money to buy men, to influence and control newspapers, either directly or indirectly, then we must admit that is a proper subject for investigation in order to get the truth, no matter which side we are on.

We ought not to quarrel about knowing what the truth is. When it comes to that, we may get together in agreement or we may still disagree, but at least we ought not to object to the American people having the evidence. The Senator, it seems to me, must admit that. It is not a question of whether we believe in Government or municipal operation of electric plants. It is a question of whether, under existing conditions, there are not some unfair methods being used, some money being spent. We want the light to shine in, we want the truth, and the Senator himself, as I understand it, admits that that part of the resolution will drop if the matter goes to the Federal Trade Commission, because the Attorney General has already decided that they have no authority to investigate that subject.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, I am not competent to discuss the legal aspect of the case. I have given emphasis to this particular matter, because that is one thing where there may be some doubt as to the effectiveness of the resolution. That question was raised by the Senator from Nebraska. I recognize that, and as to whether money is so used or not, I think we ought to have the information. I am hopeful that there will be no failure to get it through the means provided by the resolution as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. But this is one matter where there seems to be some question of doubt.

However, Mr. President, there is plenty of work to be done by the Federal Trade Commission and plenty of material to be brought out for the use of this body. I want to see the investigation made. I want to find out what abuses exist. But I do not want to have unfavorable and unjust publicity given until the facts justify it. Certainly it is not right to have an attack made upon any branch of this great industry unless it is an attack which is well founded.

We have, so far as the further proposal of the resolution is concerned, that paragraph which relates to the election of Members of this body. We have a very efficient committee thoroughly qualified to take care of the problems involved there, and I am sure the committee headed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will take care of that particular aspect of the question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. May I say that I should like to see the resolution stripped as nearly as possible of those matters which to my mind do not and will not throw very much light on legislation. In other words, I should like to see the investigation made with an eye to the future rather than the past. Even if things have transpired which ought not to have transpired, I should be interested in them only for the purpose of legislating in regard to them in the future. The men who have pioneered this great industry have taken great risks, and I presume when they had an opportunity they have taken great rewards. But I am not so much concerned about that as I am about what we shall do in the future. They have built up a great industry, and it evidently can not go along in the future without some regulation, some laws by which it shall be governed. The investigation ought to be made with that object in view. I assume that if made by the Senate it will be made with that object, and that object practically alone.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator question if it were made by the Federal Trade Commission that it would not be made with that object in view?

Mr. BORAH. No; I was rather answering the proposition of what seemed to be the inference, if not the direct statement of the Senator, that if it was made by the Senate it would be made for the purpose of exposing the situation rather than for the purpose of getting at the real facts.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator knows very well that whenever a Senate committee is appointed, immediately there is a furor; and every time the Senate committee meets there is sent out a whole lot of what the Senator from Nebraska calls propaganda. In consequence, great damage will be done to the utility companies of the country which are honest companies. I do not care anything about the other kind, but certainly some of these utility companies are honest.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] yesterday brought out the amazing fact that the life-insurance companies of the country have a billion dollars invested in these securities and the savings banks have $500,000,000 invested in them. Certainly the Senator from Idaho does not want to have a sensational hearing. I do not care what the purpose of the Senate may be, and I do not care how high-minded would be the Senators upon the committee—and they would be high-minded—yet nevertheless the fact that the Senate had appointed such committee would in itself be a sensational thing which would be heralded to everybody as an attack upon the utilities of the country.

Mr. BORAH. My opinion is that if the Senate committee did not find anything sensational, within 48 hours after the session convened there would be no newspaper men in the room.

Mr. COPELAND. That may be true.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think that the investments of the life-insurance companies and of the banks will be permanently or seriously impaired by an investigation of this kind?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; they will be seriously impaired but not permanently impaired.

Mr. DILL. They can only be seriously impaired if the financing is such as to cause serious impairment.

Mr. COPELAND. No; I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. DILL. They are not supposed to be trafficking in and buying and selling their securities, and it is only those persons who are doing so who will be hurt.

Mr. COPELAND. The very fact that such an investigation is started would in itself adversely affect the paper value of these securities, and the Senator knows it. That condition would not be permanent, of course, but why unnecessarily impose any such embarrassment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is the Senator able to tell us how much the investigation of the oil leases affected the current values of the securities there involved, such as the Pan-American Co. stock and the Mammoth Oil Co. stock?

Mr. COPELAND. No; I am not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can tell the Senator that it did not affect them at all until the sinister character of the transaction was exposed.

Mr. COPELAND. But I may say to the Senator that when we are dealing with public utilities, going into every State, into every county, into every municipality, into every locality, we are dealing with an entirely different thing than the oil business.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator——

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad of that.

Mr. NORRIS. In that we should not do anything that would interfere, if we could avoid it by a straight, honest course, with those who hold the bonds and stocks of these intermingled, intertwined, and interlocked corporations controlling the electric light and power situation; but I want to submit to the Senator that I presume it is his knowledge as well as my knowledge and the knowledge of every other person who has given any consideration to the question that electric-light plants in little communities away out in the country, in little villages and little towns as well as cities are being purchased at fabulous prices. The Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] to-day told us of a transaction in his home town of Spokane, Wash., where stock which was selling at $110 was actually bought by the Electric Bond & Share Co. for $230. I know in my State that numerous municipally owned and also privately owned electric-light plants in little country towns have been sold for three times what they are worth.

These properties are going to be given a fictitious value and used to float bonds and stock to be sold to the unsuspecting public. Would it not be a good thing if the truth were known and people were kept from investing their savings and their hard-earned and honestly-acquired money in ventures of that kind which must certainly collapse?

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator is right; but before that information is given to the public or suspicion of it is aroused in the minds of the public we should have the facts. That is the one great reason why I am in favor of having the investigation made by the Federal Trade Commission. Their's is always an unsensational procedure.

Mr. NORRIS. But I think the Senator from New York must agree with me that the particular part of the resolution as to which the Attorney General has decided the commission has no jurisdiction is the part of the resolution under which the information would be obtained as to whether these great corporations have expended money for the purpose of controlling sentiment and buying newspapers in order to enable them to purchase various small plants.

Mr. COPELAND. I know that that is the view the Senator from Nebraska takes. He makes that the heart of the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not think so. Consequently, we are not on common ground.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that the Senator does not give that part of the resolution the importance that I do. He may be right about that and I may be wrong, but the Senator must admit, I think, that some importance should be attached to that part of the resolution.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, yes; I do.

Mr. NORRIS. And the Senator agrees with me that we ought to have the information called for in that part of the resolution?

Mr. COPELAND. But the Senator knows there is——

Mr. NORRIS. The only way to get it, as I understand, is to pass the Walsh resolution and have a committee of the Senate rather than the Federal Trade Commission make the investigation.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not suppose the Senator and I are far apart. But I want to give him the other side of the shield about the buying up of these small plants. I have personal knowledge of a number of municipalities where there were publicly owned electric-light plants which failed in their operations. Why? Because they could not afford to have the trained experts to operate them. They were bought up and taken off the hands of the municipalities by near-by more powerful electric-light companies. There have been such consolidations, and frequently they have been beneficent and valuable. It works both ways.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that there are such, and I have no doubt that there are a great many plants sold for a fair value, but the Senator heard the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] to-day give as an illustration a transaction which occurred in Spokane. I have personal knowledge of another transaction which has to do not with a municipally owned plant but with a private corporation owning an electric plant in a little town of about 3,000 people. Along came the representative of the so-called and, as I believe properly called, Electric Light Trust. He went into the office of the man who practically owned the little plant. It was the first time, so far as he knew, that the representative of the trust had ever been in the town. The owner of the plant was asked what he would take for it—he owned practically all the stock—and he gave a figure without intending to have the other man accept it. He gave him a figure that he thought was so much more than the value of the plant that he considered it would end the entire conversation; but, to his surprise, the man accepted the offer and gave him the money. He has been kicking himself ever since that he did not ask $25,000 more, because he thinks he could have obtained it just as well. However, he sold the plant for twice what it was worth. Somebody has got to pay for that. It seems to me that if that plant and other plants like it are going to be put into a great corporation and stocks and bonds issued on such transactions, the people of the country ought to know it, and we ought to know it if we want to legislate upon the subject.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say to the Senator from Nebraska that if I did not believe that there are abuses, if I did not believed that there are things which should be corrected, I would be against any kind of an investigation.

Mr. NORRIS. So would I.

Mr. COPELAND. But it is because I think there are such abuses and I want them discovered and the responsibility fixed that I desire an investigation to be made. So the only difference between the Senator from Nebraska and myself is as to how the investigation should be carried on. It is my judgment that it is better that it should be conducted by the Federal Trade Commission than to have it conducted by a committee of the Senate. But I will not go into that question at any greater length now.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one question?

Mr. COPELAND. I will yield for a brief question, but the leaders are scowling at me and hinting to me that there are Senators who wish to catch the train at 6 o'clock for New York, and so forth, and I must conclude.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think that if the oil investigation had been conducted by the Federal Trade Commission the facts would ever have been unearthed which were disclosed by the Senate committee?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not know whether they would or would not. I wish to say that I think the Senators who conducted the oil investigation deserve the thanks and applause of the people. Whether the investigation in the form proposed by the pending amendment will fail or not is a question, of course, but I do not think so or, of course, I would not vote for the amendment. The same doubt attaches to the Walsh proposal.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to close in the words of the Senator from Nebraska. I made him my text and I will make him my peroration. Yesterday he said:

> Why should electric-light rates and the items that go to constitute them be secret? Why should the light that comes from the power in the rivers and the lakes, and from the bosom of the earth, in the shape of coal, be turned over to a few multimillionaires and the people be kept in ignorance of how they are being deceived with their own money and how they are being overcharged not for the luxuries but for the necessaries of life. This trust will reach into every home; it will affect every person—man, woman, and child—at least who is living a modern life in a modern home. There is no escape. Should they not know whether they are being overcharged?

Mr. President, there is not any question about that. So, for my part, I believe that the investigation should be inaugurated. But I think it is the part of wisdom for the Senate to turn it over to the Federal Trade Commission, because that body is organized for this very sort of work.

If that commission is not worthy of trust, if we do not have confidence in it, if we do not believe in it, if we have any doubt of the integrity of the men who serve on that commission, we ought to abolish it. I should not think much of a Senator who would vote one dollar of appropriation to continue the Federal Trade Commission unless it is worthy of our confidence, and, certainly, so far as I am concerned, it has mine. Therefore, I shall vote for the George amendment to the Walsh resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I well realize the state of mind of the Senate at this hour, and I regret that I must ask the indulgence of Senators while I present some observations which I entertain on this important public question. I hope they will be charitable enough to me to concede that I am not responsible for the protracted debate which has taken place this afternoon.

Mr. President, the importance of the question now before the Senate is so great that I feel it my duty to state the reasons for the position which I expect to take.

The Senate has debated for days the pending resolution, and no Senator has undertaken to say that an investigation of the public-utility corporations should not be had; indeed the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], who is leading the opposition to the resolution in the form recommended by its author, has stated that there should be an investigation, and that the result of that investigation may be either Government ownership or national regulation of the public-utility industry.

The Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate has made a unanimous report favoring an investigation.

Indeed, the representatives of these public utilities have said that they welcomed an investigation, but their only concern was that it should be a fair one.

Mr. President, in view of these facts, the real question and indeed the only question before the Senate is whether the Senate will conduct the investigation or whether the Federal Trade Commission shall be directed to reopen a subject which it has already investigated.

For myself, I shall vote against the proposal to refer this investigation to the Federal Trade Commission and give my hearty support to the resolution in the form in which it was unanimously reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee, subject to such perfecting amendments as may be necessary and which will provide for an investigation by a committee of the Senate.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the merits or demerits of the Federal Trade Commission.

In my view of the matter the question is solely whether the body which is charged to legislate shall make its own inquiry or whether it shall delegate, what I consider to be its duty in the matter, to a commission which is charged with no legislative duty; or, to put it otherwise, to a commission which shall inquire and investigate and study this important problem, but have no voice, no part, and no spokesman in this body who has been connected with the investigation, to shape possible future legislation by the Senate.

I concede it is quite proper and necessary for Congress to create commissions and bureaus to regulate and investigate for it, but there comes times and questions which are of such supreme public interest that it is the duty of the Congress and not a bureau to act for the American people.

No one questions the enormous importance of this question. We are dealing with an industry of mammoth extent and constantly enlarging, expanding almost overnight into one great industrial unit, which is no longer confined to the borders of any one State, which reaches into every avenue of life and business, which affects some of the most essential necessities of human existence and development. It is an industry which by common consent is designated a "public utility" charged with a great public interest.

Mr. President, what objection has been raised to an investigation by the United States Senate? Is it charged that it will not be thorough? Is it charged that it will not here be conducted by men of ability and integrity?

No such charge has been leveled, but the innuendo has been very plain; it is that the investigation might be too thorough and too searching, because it has been recognized on every hand that if an investigation is had by the Senate it will be conducted by the author of this resolution who is now known from one end of the country to the other as a diligent, fearless, astute, incorruptible searcher of the truth and exposer of public corruption.

There is another innuendo; it is that it will not be fair, which amounts to saying that appointive public officials are more likely to protect the public interest than the duly chosen officials of the people.

This innuendo is a challenge to democratic institutions. Developed to its logical conclusion, the Senate of the United States ought to be composed of appointed public officials rather than elected representatives of the people.

I grant that an investigation by the Senate will be more spirited, intense, partisan if you please, than one conducted by a commission. I admit that instead of a unanimous report by a commission we may get a majority and minority report by a Senate committee.

I concede that an investigation by the Senate will be more open and public than one conducted by a commission. But wherein is all this incompatible with the public interest?

Is not the success and progress of our free institutions due to the fact that we approach public questions and argue them spiritedly, from different viewpoints and apply a widely separated political philosophy to their final solution?

Is there any safer guaranty for the future? Has there been any more helpful contribution to the wisdom of the legislation in the past than the fact that it was the direct and net result of argument and strenuous contention by rival political thought and leadership—jealous only of which political group could most safely interpret the public will and promote the general welfare?

I refuse to admit that a militant majority and minority political representative government is a detriment and incapable of investigating great public questions that are fraught with tremendous consequences to the prosperity and happiness of the American people.

Mr. President, perhaps it may be suggested—indeed it has been—that the Senate is prone to too many investigations.

I challenge any Member of this body to rise now and point to any investigation which has been had by the Senate in the past and to say in the light of disclosures which such investigations produced that they should not have been had.

Will you say the so-called oil investigation, the Veterans' Bureau investigation, the slush-funds investigation have not been a benefit to the public and that they could have been better conducted by an appointive tribunal?

Mr. President, from the standpoint, then, of its importance, of its magnitude, of its far-reaching effect, of the tremendous growth of these public utilities before we have had time to stop and control our amazement, I assert this investigation is a responsibility and duty which the Senate can not delegate to a subordinate department of the Government.

Mr. President, last summer I wrote to the Federal Trade Commission asking them to furnish me with certain information. I read the letter I received in reply. The letter is dated August 29, 1927:

> MY DEAR SENATOR: In the absence of Commissioner Myers, I am writing to acknowledge your letter of August 23 with respect to economic consequences of the federation of capital of the leading industries of the country.
> Dr. Francis Walker, the commission's chief economist, who is in charge of this investigation, is away and is not expected back for about a week, at which time your letter will be brought to his attention.

Since that time I have received no information from the Federal Trade Commission. I do not say that in criticism of the commission, because perhaps it is my fault that I did not follow up my inquiry with another letter to the commission; but I was prompted to write that letter because of the great public attention I saw being attracted to the question of federation of finances and of industry and the many disastrous consequences resulting to the consumer, the investor, and the employee. If any Senator does not consider this an important question, I ask him to consult the files of the Congressional Library. Indeed, the grip this question has to-day upon the public mind is tremendously far-reaching.

Mr. President, the underlying question here is the financial structure of these utility corporations. Is the public interest being properly safeguarded?

You may complacently tolerate without protest the reckless financing of corporations that deal with purely private businesses. You may possibly permit the people to be exploited and their securities made worthless through a general system of overcapitalization. But when it comes to a great public utility, you and I can not escape the responsibility of protecting the three public interests involved:

First, the consumer, who, if dishonest capitalization exists, must pay a higher price for the products of such corporations.

Secondly, the investor, who will find, as thousands of them have found, that their stocks and bonds were worthless because of the extensive and unchecked system of stock inflation that has gone on in this country. The extent of this not long ago led a public man—none greater in this country—to say that the amount of money made from stock watering in this country aggregated a larger sum than all the larcenies, all the defalcations, all the robberies, and all the embezzlements since Columbus first landed in America.

Thirdly, the employees of these inflated corporations.

You may say it is none of our business when this occurs in the so-called private industries; notwithstanding the serious hardship consequent to the people who work for these industries, because their wage is measured after the profits upon an inflated instead of an honest capitalization and an honest investment in the industry. You can not take such a position if the corporation is performing a semipublic service.

A recent magazine article is quoted in reference to finance juggling in New York as follows:

> It has been estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury that over $1,700,000,000 annually is taken from the public by stock frauds. If these figures include losses from fake mines and oil prospects, stock-market gambling, bucket shops, and double and treble commissions paid for rigging markets and faking market sales, exorbitant promotion profits, watered stock and inflated balance sheets, fake reorganizations of defunct business, freeze outs, memberships in empty mutual-welfare corporations, fake guaranties against stock losses, bonds secured by uncompleted or vacant buildings, certificates of anæmic investment trusts, forged trade acceptances, as well as the thousands of varieties of badly conceived ventures floated chiefly on air, then this estimate is over modest.
> Out of 150 questionnaires sent out haphazardly by the attorney general's securities bureau, and returned by corporations, 28 revealed fraud in the sale of stock and handling of corporation assets.
> An investigation of the Consolidated Stock Exchange disclosed that its brokers in August, 1925, were short over $3,000,000 worth of securities out of $12,000,000 pretended to have been bought for the public. This $3,000,000 was "cleared" out of existence by an ingenious bookkeeping system of offsetting purchases by a fiction called "loans to brokers."

Mr. President, I consider this—and I do not hesitate to say so—a public and political question of the highest, if not of supreme, importance in America to-day.

Mr. President, some political party some day in this country must go forward and say to the unorganized millions, "We will protect you against unjust and unfair exploitation and extortion by those who have been able to gather together huge sums of money, and whose power is so mighty that even public officials shake and tremble in their presence."

I am not opposed to big business. I am against Government ownership of private business. For seven years in the Committee on Finance I have demanded, and I now demand, a reduction in the taxes of the more than 100,000 small, struggling corporations of this country that are to-day penalized by an increase in their corporation income taxes. It is dishonesty in business that I oppose and condemn. It is unfair discrimination against little business by big business that I protest.

If you are not interested, Senators, let me assure you the average business man is interested, for he sees ahead of him a vacant store and a vacant place in business life. If you are not interested in this problem of federation of capital, you will find that it is of interest to the independent manufacturers who are asking us to protect and save them against the improper methods and the unfair competition that they have suffered from these great combinations of wealth.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. After I finish I shall be glad to yield.

Let me now read to Senators on this side what the Democratic platform in 1924 said on this subject:

FRAUDULENT STOCK SALES

> We favor the immediate passage of such legislation as may be necessary to enable the States efficiently to enforce their laws relating to the gradual financial strangling of innocent investors, workers, and consumers, caused by the indiscriminate promotion, refinancing, and reorganizing of corporations on an inflated and overcapitalized basis, resulting already in the undermining and collapse of many railroads, public service and industrial corporations, manifesting itself in unemployment, irreparable loss, and waste, and which constitute a serious menace to the stability of our economic system.

Mr. President, I appreciate that some Members on this side of the Chamber take a different view of this matter and assert that the Federal Trade Commission and not the Senate ought to conduct this investigation.

It may be that when the vote is taken a majority will so view it.

In such event, I have every hope that the assertions that have been made here that the Federal Trade Commission will make a thorough investigation will prove to be true.

But it is entirely obvious that investigations will deal with past political adventures of these utilities, and that the activities of the "lobby" of which we have heard so much will continue.

Whatever kind of investigation we conduct, let us do something here and now to bring for all future time invisible government into the open, so that our people—the unorganized and unselfish millions who place confidence in our capacity to keep their Government free from selfish and contaminating influences—may know who are here advising and urging us as to our attitude on all questions that relate to the regulation of great predatory interests.

This hour and this issue emphasizes once more the necessity of bringing from under cover and into the open the selfish influences that seek to promote or defeat pending legislation.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I want to find out whether we can not come to some kind of an agreement as to when we shall vote on this resolution. Would it be agreeable to the Senator from Montana to fix the time to vote at not later than 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, he to have one hour to-morrow?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I dislike very much to place any limit on debate in this matter. I think the debate is coming to a close.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator said that to me day before yesterday, and said it again yesterday, and said it again to-day. Debate has not come to a close, and I see no apparent indication that the debate will come to a close unless we fix a time to vote.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have taken pains to make inquiry, and I know of only two Senators who desire to talk on this side, who have both said they would talk briefly. As I said before, I trust that I may be accorded the privilege of closing the debate, and I do not like to be limited in my time.

Mr. WATSON. The only point about it is that I am informed that two or three Senators want to leave the city, and that the debate may be prolonged to-morrow for the express purpose of giving them an opportunity to come back. I do not think that is fair treatment of the Senate, when we have now before us so many great problems to consider.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I quite agree with the Senator. Some of the supporters of the measure on this side of the Chamber are desirous of leaving the city this evening, and they are extremely hopeful that we may be able to reach a vote to-day.

Mr. DILL. Why can we not stay here and finish the debate to-night?

Mr. HEFLIN. I was just going to make that suggestion.

Mr. DILL. Why do we have to adjourn every day at 5 o'clock?

Mr. WATSON. We do not. If the Senate will stay here, and Senators will remain until we take a vote, personally I shall be very highly pleased. I shall be glad if the Senator from Montana will be permitted to speak his hour, because he told me a while ago that he would like to have an hour to conclude the debate, and he is entitled to that time. I think it is the duty of the Senate to remain here until the vote shall have been taken and this matter shall have been finally disposed of. So far as I am concerned, as the chairman of the committee, I intend to insist that we do remain here until the vote shall have been taken.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he sits down?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. As a member of the committee, I did desire to speak briefly on the resolution, but if we can vote to-night I will very gladly forego the opportunity.

Mr. WATSON. That is very kind of the Senator. I hope others will be as considerate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I agree with the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana. We have farm relief legislation pending here. We hope to dispose of Muscle Shoals at this session of Congress if it is possible to do so. I submit that we have devoted considerable time to the consideration of this question. It seems to me that this question has been pretty thoroughly discussed in the Senate. Able speeches have been made on both sides. Most of the Senators are ready to vote.

I do not think we ought to adjourn now and carry this matter over into the session of to-morrow. Let us stay here until 8 or 9 o'clock to-night and be through with it, and take up these other measures and go on with the legislative work of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have taken no time on this matter, and I have no desire to do so now. I do not want to talk upon the subject matter, so far as that is concerned. But I do think that the importance of this resolution will warrant us in taking an unusual course in respect to it, and I can not for the life of me see why upon a matter of this extraordinary importance it is essential for us to remain here until midnight to dispose of it. I therefore suggest that if we can we agree by unanimous consent upon an hour for a vote at such time as may be convenient to those who are present, and permit those who desire to speak upon the resolution to be heard.

I suggest to the Senator from Indiana and to the Senator from Montana that it might very readily be that an agreement by unanimous consent for a vote upon the resolution could be had, and that that should be done. There is no use, it strikes me, to punish some of us by keeping us here indefinitely upon this matter. Beyond that, the importance of the matter, I think, would justify us in reaching some sort of an agreement.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest that we reach an agreement to vote at not later than 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON. That is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I trust the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. ASHURST. I will not withdraw it, Mr. President. I want to vote on the resolution, and I can not be here at 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. Can we not agree that debate shall be limited?

Mr. WATSON. May I inquire whether the Senator from Arizona will be here the following day?

Mr. ASHURST. I think I will just object to a vote to-morrow at 4 o'clock.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, let us make it 5 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am agreeable to the suggestion, although I have nothing to do with the fixing of the time to vote, I recognize, but if the Senator from Arizona, for instance——

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to voting at 5 o'clock on Saturday.

Mr. WATSON. I have. I think the only thing to do is to proceed with the debate now.

Mr. HARRISON. That is right; let us go on.

Mr. JOHNSON. I disagree. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], who is necessarily absent, and therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TYSON. I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] and the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] are necessarily absent, and that these Senators have a general pair.

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—42

NOT VOTING—8

Blease	du Pont	Goff	Norris
Caraway	Fletcher	King	Tyson

So the Senate refused to take a recess.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], who objected a while ago, if they will object to a unanimous-consent agreement to take a vote to-morrow afternoon at 4 o'clock?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have not the slightest objection to voting now or postponing the vote; but on behalf of a number of Senators I have made the objection at their request. I will not mention their names. I will let them speak for themselves.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator now object?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; I do; certainly.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator object to fixing a time to vote at any time to-morrow?

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to fixing a time to vote at any hour on Friday or Saturday.

Mr. WATSON. But any time to-morrow?

Mr. ASHURST. To that I must object.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does not the vote we have just taken indicate that we want to vote on the proposition to-night?

Mr. WATSON. I think so.

Mr. HARRISON. Why not go ahead and conclude the debate and vote?

Mr. WATSON. Very well; that course is agreeable to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

Mr. MOSES. Let it be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 5, after the word "corporations," the Committee on Interstate Commerce reported to insert the words "doing an interstate business."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I move to amend the committee amendment by inserting, after "interstate," the words "or international."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Montana to the committee amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 5, after the word "interstate," insert the words "or international," so that it will read: "corporations doing an interstate or international business."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an article written by Frank R. Kent, of the Baltimore Sun, which I ask that the clerk may read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, February 14, 1928]

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS

By Frank R. Kent

PUBLIC UTILITY WISDOM?

WASHINGTON, February 13.—To a detached view the almost desperate effort of the public-utilities interests to sidetrack the proposal to investigate them by having the investigating done by the Federal Trade Commission instead of Senator WALSH will not in the long run turn out to be a very intelligent thing.

Apparently their idea is that the best interests of the industry will be served by making a joke of the investigation and the one thing above all to be desired is to keep it out of the hands of WALSH. Along this line the extraordinary lobby which the public utilities have assembled in Washington, headed by two ex-Senators, one a Republican, Lenroot of Wisconsin, the other a Democrat, Thomas of Colorado, has been working and with such success that it was generally believed to-day the votes were in hand. To most observers the mere idea of the Federal Trade Commission, as at present constituted, making a real investigation is absurd.

In the opinion of those who look farthest ahead, if they succeed in their present drive to smother the investigation, which is what it amounts to, the position in which the public utilities will be placed will be neither enviable nor sound—nor, it might be added, secure. If they succeed, they will for the present avoid an investigation; but they make it more sure in the future and in a form less palatable than is now proposed. It is, of course, not to be expected that the employed lobbyists working for the immediate fee should take a broad view of this business, but it is curious that some of the really enlightened men behind them—men of great influence in the industry—should be equally shortsighted.

No one blames them for being opposed to an investigation. Investigations, whether justified or not, are inevitably irritating and upsetting to the investigated. The fact is, however, that regardless of their contention that the investigation is unnecessary, and notwithstanding the power and extent of the lobby, weeks ago it was conceded that the order for the investigation in some form would pass. Under such circumstances, it is argued, if the public utilities are as good as they say they are, the intelligent attitude would seem to be one that in effect said to the public: "We did not, of course, want an investigation because we believe none needed. But as the Senate has seen fit to order one we insist that it be as thorough as possible. We want Senator WALSH, who started this thing, to go to the bottom now he has started. If there is anything rotten in this industry, it is to our interests to know it, and the sooner the better. If there is not—and we believe there is not—then we want a clean bill of health."

That would have been consistent with the position publicly assumed by such leaders of the industry as Owen Young, and with the protestations of purity made by its counsel before the committee. It would, in fact, square with the facts so far as the really big men are concerned, because they are, with few exceptions, not only personally on the level but run their business that way, deal from the top of the deck. There are extremely few Insulls among them.

Instead of taking that position, however, they have taken one that in effect says this: "We are afraid of a real investigation. We are afraid to let the able and experienced WALSH insert the probe. We are not really as pure as we pretend, and therefore we think the safest thing for us is to amend the Walsh resolution, take the thing out of his too keen and capable hands, put the job up to the Federal Trade Commission—where the presence as chairman of the hard-boiled Humphrey makes a fine coat of whitewash a dead-sure proposition."

What seems to be overlooked by the usually enlightened utility men is, first, the natural deduction for the public to make is that fear of Senator WALSH rather argues a consciousness of guilt; second, that the uninspiring personnel of the Federal Trade Commission and the dominance over it of Humphrey is such as to make it certain that its report, however eulogistic, will satisfy very few outside the industry itself. In other words, the contention is that the net result will be an increased and not a diminished hostility toward public utilities—a hostility calculated to make them more of an issue in politics than ought to be the case. It does seem that it would have been a wiser course, if there is nothing to be ashamed of, to let Senator WALSH find that fact out. It would certainly redound to the credit of the industry if he did. But perhaps they know their business best.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not think we are going to have a vote on this resolution to-night. I had hoped we would vote on it this afternoon, as many other Senators had hoped, but that hope apparently is not to be realized. There are some of us who wish to speak briefly on the subject but do not care to proceed when the few Senators who will remain to listen to the discussion are exhausted. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as before, on account of the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] by reason of illness, I withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS (when his name was called). Upon this vote I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] and the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] are necessarily absent, and that each of those Senators has a general pair.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—36

Barkley	Frazier	McLean	Sheppard
Black	Glass	McMaster	Shipstead
Blaine	Gould	McNary	Steiwer
Borah	Harris	Neely	Swanson

NOT VOTING—10

Blease	du Pont	King	Tyson
Caraway	Fletcher	Norris
Dale	Goff	Pittman

So the Senate refused to take a recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana to the first committee amendment. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment on page 1, line 5, after the word "interstate," to insert the words "or international," so as to read, "doing an interstate or international business."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce was, on page 2, line 1, after the word "stocks," to strike out "such" and insert "two or more"; in line 2, after the word "corporations," to insert "operating in different States"; in line 3, after the word "by," to strike out "or affiliated with"; in line 10, after the word "which," to insert "such"; in line 16, before the word "public," to insert "such"; in the same line, after the word "by," to insert "such"; in line 22, before the word "holding," to insert "such," so as to read:

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of the Senate, to be elected thereby, be hereby empowered and directed to inquire into and report upon: (1) The growth of the capital assets and capital liabilities of public utility corporations doing an interstate or international business supplying either electrical energy in the form of power or light or both, however produced, or gas, natural or artificial, of corporations holding the stocks of two or more public utility corporations operating in different States, and of nonpublic utility corporations owned or controlled by such holding companies; (2) the method of issuing, the price realized or value received, the commissions or bonuses paid or received, and other pertinent facts with respect to the various security issues of all classes of corporations herein named, including the bonds and other evidences of indebtedness thereof, as well as the stocks of the same; (3) the extent to which such holding companies or their stockholders control or are financially interested in financial, engineering, construction, and/or management corporations, and the relation, one to the other, of the classes of corporations last named, the holding companies, and the public utility corporations; (4) the services furnished to such public utility corporations by such holding companies and/or their associated, affiliated, and/or subsidiary companies, the fees, commissions, bonuses, or other charges made therefor, and the earnings and expenses of such holding companies and their associated, affiliated, and/or subsidiary companies; and (5) the value or detriment to the public of such holding companies owning the stock or otherwise controlling such public utility corporations immediately or remotely, with the extent of such ownership or control, and particularly what legislation, if any, should be enacted by Congress to correct any abuses that may exist in the organization or operation of such holding companies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 13, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the elections herein referred to shall be limited to the elections of President, Vice President, Members of the United States Senate and of the House of Representatives.

So as to read:

The committee is further empowered and directed to inquire and report whether, and to what extent, such corporations or any of the officers thereof or anyone in their behalf or in behalf of any organization of which any such corporation may be a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, have made any and what effort to influence or control public opinion on account of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electrical energy is generated and distributed, or to influence or control elections: Provided, That the elections herein referred to shall be limited to the elections of President, Vice President, Members of the United States Senate, and of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., February 15, 1928.

Senator THOMAS J. WALSH,
Care Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Have just wired Senator WALTER F. GEORGE as follows: "South needs such investigation of electric power industry as Walsh resolution would provide if for no other reason contributions to congressional campaigns in South as well as elsewhere should be disclosed." Don't understand his position.

C. A. COBB,
Editor Southern Ruralist.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether such a lobbyist as the one who sent that telegram should be spurned from the doors of the Senate?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I ask unanimous consent that the telegram which I send to the desk may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MIAMI, FLA., January 20, 1928.

Hon. JAMES E. WATSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The executive council of the American Federation of Labor favors an investigation of power companies, but it believes such investigation should be made by competent experts free from partisan political influence and without political significance.

WILLIAM GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I trust the amendment of the committee under consideration now will not be agreed to; but I should say in this connection that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] suggested to me an amendment to this provision a while ago which, for the assurance it would give to some doubting Thomases, perhaps should be inserted, that would limit the time back of which the committee could not go in this matter of campaign contributions.

Likewise, Mr. President, when we shall arrive at that point, I shall ask leave to amend by taking out the words "and directed," in line 3, page 2, so that the committee would be empowered but not directed to inquire, and have a discretion as to these matters.

I ask unanimous consent, if the Senator from Oregon desires to present his amendment, that it may be considered before the amendment of the committee now under consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. WATSON. What is the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has the Senator from Oregon prepared an amendment which he desires to offer?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I did not have in mind offering an amendment. I merely suggested it to the author of the resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I will offer the amendment suggested to me by the Senator from Oregon. After the word "or," on page 3, line 12, insert "since 1923."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 12, after the word "or," it is proposed to insert "since 1923," so that, if amended, it will read:

and what effort to influence or control public opinion on account of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electrical energy is generated and distributed, or, since 1923, to influence or control elections—

And so forth.

Mr. WATSON. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. With that amendment I trust the amendment of the committee will be rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator why he proposes 1923?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Oregon suggested that it be 1925. I said to him that I should not object to 1923. That would be within the last five years. I suggest this because in the course of the debate some apprehension was exhibited lest this committee, which would have enough work to do anyway, should go back an indefinite length of time to ascertain the amount of money that had been contributed to elections; so I thought it was a reasonable thing that some limit should be placed upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment is, on page 3, in line 13, after the word "elections," to insert the proviso heretofore read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I trust we shall have a vote on that.

Mr. ASHURST. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 13, after the word "elections," it is proposed to insert a comma and the following proviso:

Provided, That the elections herein referred to shall be limited to the elections of President, Vice President, Members of the United States Senate, and of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The matter of elections of Members of Congress and presidential electors has been investigated by special committees in 1920, 1924, and 1926. I do not see any reason for traveling over that ground again. I do not know why that should be made a specific subject of investigation when it has already been investigated. I should like to exclude that.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator want to exclude that and have his original resolution restored, as asked for above, to investigate campaign expenses, including the election of every constable or sheriff or county or State officer anywhere in the United States?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I said to the Senator that I was going to ask to amend the resolution by striking out the word "directed," so that the committee would go just as far as it cared to go, as far as seemed to it important, in connection with the material subject of the inquiry. If the election of a constable had anything at all to do with these other matters, I should like to have the committee go into it. I can not conceive, however, that it could possibly have any such effect.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

On line 15, page 3, I move to strike out all after the word "Senate." The effect of the amendment will be to relieve the committee, if constituted, from an investigation of the elections of Members of the House of Representatives. I have already made some remarks in the Senate on that subject, and I think the Senator from Montana probably will agree with me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I hope that amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is to exclude investigations with reference to the election of Members of the House?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. And in order to do that we will vote "yea"?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas give me his attention? In order to perfect the language in harmony with the suggestion of the Senator, should not the word "and" be inserted following the word "President"?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; the word "and" should be inserted there. Shall I restate the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; let the Secretary state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. Before the word "Members" it is proposed to insert the word "and," and after the word "Senate" it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph—that is, the words "and of the House of Representatives," so that, if amended, the proviso will read:

Provided, That the elections herein referred to shall be limited to the elections of President, Vice President, and Members of the United States Senate.

Mr. WATSON. I hope that amendment may be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the committee? The Chair hears none. The question is upon the amendment of the committee as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I merely desire to say, with reference to the amendment as it stands, that, as I have heretofore stated, the purpose of this inquiry into elections is to find out whether, as has been charged—and I do not undertake to say whether it is true or whether it is not true—these public-utility corporations have been spending money to control elections in the various States, either to control the regulatory bodies in the various States or to control elections in which questions of the purchase and sale of properties of municipalities are involved.

As I said, I have a number of letters from people in municipalities where a municipal plant is in existence saying that they have been obliged to contend again and again in elections against an attempt by one of the great combinations to get possession of those local utilities. I should like to inquire into the truth of those matters. The elections of President and Vice President and the elections of Senators and Representatives have only the most remote relation to the elections that are of consequence when you are investigating public utilities; and if you confine the inquiry to elections that have not much of anything to do with the question, you exclude all the elections that are of direct consequence in the matter of the control of public utilities.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, does the Senator think that that is a question to be inquired into by the Congress of the United States? I have no doubt on earth that utility companies do undertake to control municipalities. I have not the remotest doubt on earth that they are guilty of bribery and corruption; but it seems to me that that is a matter of inquiry by the municipality or by the State itself, and not by the Federal Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me remind the Senator that it is restricted to contributions made by "such corporations"—that is to say, these corporations that are engaged in interstate business of one kind or another.

Mr. GLASS. It would seem to me to be a very comprehensive proposition, one that would involve the invasion of the States and of subdivisions of the States by a congressional investigation; and therefore I think we ought to adopt this proposed limitation.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I thought there had been a general feeling on the other side of the aisle that we might give up any rights of the States.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, it is not a question of "the other side of the aisle." It is a question for the judgment of the Senate of the United States. I have very little patience with these people who have not an idea beyond partisanship.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, there was much discussion in the committee, during the consideration of this measure there, as to the right or authority of the Congress of the United States to investigate all these local elections; and I think members of the committee were very decidedly of the opinion that we had no such authority. I want to ask my friend from Montana what right he thinks the Senate of the United States has to investigate the election of a constable out in Missoula, Mont., or the election of a county officer out there.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator puts it in that bald way, of course, I should say it had no right; but when it goes to investigating the activities of corporations engaged in interstate commerce it becomes a very important matter as to whether those corporations thus engaged in interstate commerce are engaged in trying to elect constables in Missoula.

Mr. WATSON. But, of course, the Senator includes in "interstate commerce" those who sell stocks and bonds across State lines.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. WATSON. That is just where we disagree.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me there ought to be no dispute on the proposition which is now before the Senate. Assuming that we want an investigation, it seems to me that even those who are opposed to the entire resolution ought to be fair enought to say, "If you have an investigation, we want one that is effective."

I think myself that this amendment is very important, and, if agreed to, will curtail the power and the jurisdiction of this committee so as to prevent it from going into many things that are intended by the scope of the resolution to be looked into.

I sympathize entirely with those who say we ought not, we have no jurisdiction, to go into a village or a city election. That is not what this resolution contemplates—to ascertain whether John Smith or Richard Roe was elected councilman for a certain ward in a certain city, or whether John Jones was elected sheriff of a certain county. That is not contemplated in this investigation. But, if we adopt the amendment, suppose there is some proposition in which the General Electric Co., for instance, or the Electric Bond & Share Co., is interested—it covers the entire United States—and the proposition is submitted to a city, a village, a State, or a county; and let us say, for the sake of argument—of course, it is pretty rank to say that these people would do some of these things—but let us assume for the sake of argument that they would spend, in an election in a village or a city, a million dollars to put across a proposition, either to buy or to sell a system for the generation and distribution of electricity in that town: Does anybody say we have not the authority to investigate contributions made by a corporation engaged in interstate commerce, even though it be at a municipal election? If this amendment shall be agreed to, the committee can not investigate into expenditures of the Electric Light Trust or the Water Power Trust, even though they might admit that they spent a million dollars in some particular election, unless the contribution was made at the time of a general election, where electors for President or Members of the Senate were chosen.

Referring to the election in California where the initiative was involved, about which we have been talking, off and on, during this debate, a large part of the money raised was spent to control that election, but we could not investigate such expenditure unless that election were called at the same time the people were voting for Senators or a President of the United States.

Senators should not get mixed up and think that there is contemplated here an investigation of the elections of State or county or municipal officials. That is not the idea at all. If we are going to do anything about these big corporations engaged in water-power development and the development and distribution of electricity across State lines, corporations engaged in interstate business, selling their bonds or stocks in different States, if we are going to investigate them at all the investigations should not be limited to elections where Senators are elected.

We are really asked to take away from this committee the power to make a very important investigation, and the amendment is directed to the very heart of this resolution itself. It would almost nullify it. In this particular we would be almost nullifying the work that could be done if any investigation were to take place.

I appeal to those who are not going to vote for the resolution to vote against this amendment, because they should concede to those who favor the investigation that if we have an investigation at all it ought to be effective, and it can not be effective if this amendment shall be agreed to, in my judgment.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I view with the same abhorrence entertained by the Senator from Nebraska the idea of corruption in municipal elections, but I can not bring myself to the point where I can believe that it is a proper function of the Senate of the United States to go into the question of municipal elections anywhere in this country. I do not believe the Senate has yet become simply a grand jury.

I rose particularly, however, to say that I think one of the most sensible things that has been said upon this question has been said by the Governor of Ohio, with whom I disagree very sharply politically. I ask unanimous consent to have read at the desk a brief statement the Governor of Ohio made recently on this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Ohio State Journal, January 30, 1928]

OHIO WILL RESIST UTILITY CONTROL BY UNITED STATES, DONAHEY SAYS—CENTRALIZATION IN GOVERNMENT DENOUNCED BY GOVERNOR; USURPATION, HE CALLS IT—HOME RULE ASKED

On the eve of a meeting of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the United States Senate to consider its report on the Walsh resolution for a wide-open investigation of the electric and gas utilities, Governor Donahey, Sunday, declared the temper of Ohio people would be to resist usurpation by the Federal Government of the State rights in public-utility regulation.

Governor Donahey was moved to this expression when shown a statement made by Governor Byrd, of Virginia, in which the latter denounced the infringement of the Federal Government on State rights, through Congress, commissions, and courts as the most serious menace to America.

"The day's dispatches from Washington indicate there are in prospect not only a Senate investigation of the electric and gas utilities, but also the telephone and telegraph and the motion-picture industries," Governor Donahey said.

"The only end of such investigations will be legislation which will take authority from States and lodge it in Federal commissions in Washington. The inevitable result will be that regulation of utilities, the motion-picture industry, or any other industry which Congress may choose to investigate, will be further removed from the people.

"During my 15 years' political experience in Columbus, I have observed that the tendency has been to centralize administration in Columbus. Washington is now endeavoring to absorb the prerogatives of the States and to centralize government there. The tendency should be, rather, to get back to home rule. Many of the bills I have vetoed intended to centralize government in the State; for that reason I rejected them. The tendency should be to get back to the people.

"In Ohio the people believe in home rule. That's why, in 1912, they wrote into the State constitution an amendment giving local governments the right to regulate their utilities, with the right of appeal to the utilities commission provided to safeguard all concerned. In Ohio regulation of utilities is a success; we do not need any aid in this respect from the Federal Government.

"In Ohio the sale of utility securities, like that of all other classes of securities, is under State control. But regardless of financial operations in utility securities, consumers' interests are protected, for the companies' earnings are restricted to a fair return on the value of the property used and useful for serving the public.

"The people of Ohio will resist any effort by Congress to usurp their rights in utility regulation. They feel competent, through their municipal councils, their legislature, their commission, and their courts, to safeguard themselves with regard to service, rates, and financing.

"The Senate, and particularly the Senators from Ohio, should be mindful of the fact that this State adheres to the principle of State rights."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, is the question on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended by the Senator from Arkansas. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], who is absent on account of illness. I therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], who is absent. If the Senator from Arkansas were present, he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 50, nays 34, as follows:

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Clerk will state the next amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 5, after the words "The expenses of said investigation," insert a comma and the words "which shall not exceed $30,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, my attention has been called to the fact that the resolution as drawn does not in one respect comply with the law. It seems that the law prescribes that the cost shall not exceed 25 cents per hundred words, instead of $1.25 per printed page. Is that correct, may I ask the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Accordingly I submit an amendment, as follows: On page 3, line 23, strike out the words "$1.25 per printed page" and substitute therefor the words "25 cents per 100 words."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I move to strike out, on page 1, line 3, the words "and directed."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 3, after the word "empowered," strike out the words "and directed," so that it will read:

That a committee of five Members of the Senate be elected thereby and be hereby empowered to inquire into and report upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I propose the following amendment: On page 1, line 1, after the word "Resolved," strike out down to the word "upon," in line 3 of the same page, and insert:

That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inquire into and report to the Senate, by filing with the Secretary thereof within each 30 days after the passage of this resolution and finally on the completion of the investigation, the stenographic report of the evidence taken by the commission to accompany its partial and final reports upon.

And then follows the resolution as it has been perfected by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may the amendment be reported by the clerk from the desk?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

Mr. GEORGE. May I say just a word in explanation merely of my amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. Amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia by adding the following:

The inquiry before the Federal Trade Commission shall be open to the public and due notice of the time and place of all hearings shall be given by the commission.

Mr. GEORGE. Where is it proposed to insert the amendment? At the appropriate place in the resolution?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. I have some additional amendments, and I reserve the right to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. I have offered it as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I was inquiring whether it was an amendment to my amendment. I do not see how it could be appropriately attached to my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests that the Senator from Alabama withdraw his amendment and offer it at another place.

Mr. BLACK. Very well. I shall offer it if the Senator's amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama is altogether germane, not to the resolution as it is before us at all but it is germane to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. If the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is adopted without any amendment at all, I inquire of the Chair——

The VICE PRESIDENT. An amendment to the resolution does not have to be germane to anything in the resolution. It can be offered to the committee amendment or to the text of the resolution.

Mr. GEORGE. What I had in mind was that it might not appear appropriately in connection with my amendment, but if my amendment is adopted, I then said I propose to offer some additional amendments and I would not object to this amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My parliamentary inquiry of the President of the Senate is, If the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia should be adopted by the Senate, then will the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama be in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be in order, but not as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I understand that the law makes Federal Trade Commission inquiries secret. This would be a repeal of the law to that extent. Can the Senate do that by resolution?

Mr. GEORGE. Then, of course, it would be merely ineffectual. I stated in the debate that I do not know what the law is, but if the amendment is offered I shall accept it.

Mr. DILL. But the amendment would have no effect if it is in contradiction of the law.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know what the law requires, because I stated specifically that I do not know, but if the amendment is offered I shall not object to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama can be offered as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. If the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is adopted, then the amendment of the Senator from Alabama will have to be inserted at the proper place in the resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama it is to perfect the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. When an amendment is to be perfected it must be done before the amendment itself is adopted. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama proposes to open the hearings by the Federal Trade Commission to the public. It is in order to perfect the amendment of the Senator from Georgia before we vote on it. It does seem to me the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama ought to be voted on as it is intended as a specific amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. GEORGE. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I hope the amendment to the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BLACK. In order to clear this up may I read the law on the subject?

Mr. GEORGE. I have said I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to read the law. I want to read the law with reference to whether or not we have that power. My judgment is that we do not have the power, but I want to offer the amendment, because I think it should be a public hearing if there is a submission of the matter to the Federal Trade Commission. My judgment is from the law that we do not have the power.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests that the clerk read the amendment of the Senator from Georgia as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Alabama.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inquire into and report to the Senate by filing with the Secretary thereof within each 30 days after the passage of this resolution, and finally on the completion of the investigation, the stenographic report of the evidence taken by the commission to accompany the partial and final reports, upon—the inquiry before the Federal Trade Commission shall be open to the public and due notice of the time and place of all hearings shall be given by the commission.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator from Alabama say that he is offering an amendment which he knows is contrary to existing law?

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator from Alabama makes that statement, I shall object to his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The inclusion of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama as read comes after the word "upon." It should either follow or precede that word in some other way.

Mr. BLACK. I would arrange that, but I would like to have the privilege of answering the Senator from Indiana. The law provides as follows with reference to the powers of the Federal Trade Commission:

To make public from time to time such portions of information obtained by it hereafter, except trade secrets and names of customers, as it shall deem expedient in the public interest.

If this matter should be submitted to the Federal Trade Commission and they wanted to have a star chamber proceeding, I understand the law is that they could prohibit any human being from being there when they took evidence, because they have the power to do it.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. I am unable to agree with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. If the Senate has the power by resolution to require the Federal Trade Commission to conduct the investigation, I think it has the power to govern the procedure to obtain. If the Senate undertakes to make the hearings public, I think it can do that, because the investigation will not be conducted under law independent of the resolution. The power of the Federal Trade Commission to conduct the investigation emanates from the resolution. If the power is granted by the resolution I think we have the right to govern the procedure under which the investigation shall be conducted.

Mr. GLASS. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama is contrary to the statute, what becomes of the provision of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, which requires the Federal Trade Commission to report its proceedings every 30 days after the adoption of the resolution?

Mr. BLACK. The commission can do so if it desires.

Mr. GLASS. If the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is contrary to the statute, likewise the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is so.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; undoubtedly.

Mr. GEORGE. I presume the Senator from Alabama is offering his amendment in good faith, and so presuming, I suggest to him that his amendment should precede the word "upon" so that the grammatical construction, with proper punctuation, would be at least in proper form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary is reconstructing the amendment as amended.

Mr. BLACK. May I suggest in reply to the statement that I was offering my amendment in good faith, that I am offering it in good faith to this extent that I believe the Federal Trade Commission has the right to deny the publication of any word of evidence or any report that it makes, but I believe that, if there is an effort in good faith to have a bona fide investigation by the commission, and that commission shall attempt to conduct an investigation in good faith, it will obey the injunction of this single body of the National Legislature, although we can not change the law as written; we can not by resolution change any existing statute passed by both Houses which sets forth the powers of the commission. I assume that if the Federal Trade Commission will act in good faith in conducting an investigation it will in good faith obey this injunction by the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am in full accord with the views expressed by the Senator from Alabama. Both Houses of Congress and the President of the United States enacted a law which reposed in the commission the right to make public its proceedings. The Senate of the United States can not change that law; it can not take power away from the commission by any resolution it may adopt, that is to say, the amendment of the Senator from Alabama can go on as just a kind of appeal to the Federal Trade Commission, but I am going to argue as suggested a little while ago by the Senator from Virginia that that amendment is no more obnoxious to the statute than is the amendment of the Senator from Georgia itself obnoxious to the statute.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, Mr. President, I am satisfied that my amendment is not obnoxious to the statute, or I should not have offered it. I am perfectly satisfied that my amendment is a proper one, if the Senate sees fit to adopt it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky, but I wish to say that I would not at this late hour go into any discussion of the relevancy, propriety, and legality, so to speak, of this particular amendment when it has been before us for several days.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the event that the Federal Trade Commission should submit to the Department of Justice, as it did on a former occasion, which action has been discussed here, an inquiry as to whether it had the power to make the investigation contemplated by the Senator's amendment and the Attorney General should render such a decision as he rendered in the other case, where would this investigation be?

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senate shall adopt my amendment, the investigation will be in the hands of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator evidently did not catch my question. Suppose the commission should ask the Department of Justice whether under existing law, regardless of the pending resolution, it has the power to make the kind of investigation proposed and the Department of Justice should render an opinion holding that it can not make such an investigation under the existing law——

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator mean the investigation called for by the whole resolution or by some particular part of the resolution?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, by some particular part of the resolution.

Mr. GEORGE. To which particular part of the resolution does the Senator refer?

Mr. BARKLEY. For instance, to that portion with reference to campaign contributions.

Mr. GEORGE. I propose to add another amendment, which, in my judgment, will leave that within the jurisdiction of the committee, if the amendment shall be adopted.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator think that we can amend existing law by the adoption of a Senate resolution?

Mr. GEORGE. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then what effect would any amendment on that subject have?

Mr. GEORGE. I am not undertaking to amend existing law.

Mr. BARKLEY. I can not see how any amendment that the Senator contemplates would cure the objection that I have in mind.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know that I understand the Senator; but if the Senator has not heard what I said, I am sorry. I said that I intend to offer some additional amendments requiring the Federal Trade Commission to inquire whether any of the practices enumerated in the resolution tend to restrain trade or commerce or tend to create a monopoly or constitute a violation of any of the antitrust acts.

Mr. BARKLEY. That might all be included and still not touch the question. The question of what constitutes restraint of trade is a technical question under the law, and the act which created the Federal Trade Commission somewhat elaborates in that regard.

It is conceivable that there might be practices that were reprehensible that did not, in letter or in spirit, violate the terms of the antitrust acts.

Mr. GEORGE. I quite agree with the Senator, but the proposition is this: When the Senate asks for a specific investigation and asks whether the practices set forth constitute a violation of the Federal antitrust laws then the commission will be bound to answer us, and in order to answer us it will have to examine the facts.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would not the commission, though, be in a position where they might say, "admitting a certain state of facts to exist, they do not constitute a violation of the antitrust laws, and, therefore, we have no power to go into the question"?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think so; I do not think that the commission would take that view of it. The commission did not take that view in connection with various other resolutions before it, though it finally answered that it did not think that the practices complained of constituted a violation of the Federal anitrust laws.

Mr. President, I apprehended that there might be discussion upon the amendment. I merely rose at this time to make plain what the amendment provides, conceding that it might be effective for any purpose. It provides merely that, in lieu of a committee of Senators, the inquiry shall be referred to the Federal Trade Commission; that the Federal Trade Commission shall be required and directed to pursue the inquiry—I am merely stating the substance of it now—that reports be made each 30 days, so that there may be no unnecessary delay in bringing the facts before the Senate and the country; and that the stenographic report of such evidence as the commission may take shall accompany the partial reports and the final report to be made by the commission.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] has added a further amendment providing that the hearings shall be open and on notice. If his amendment is valid and is binding on the commission, I presume the commission will comply with it. If it is not actually binding upon the commission, yet it would be within the power of the commission to comply with it in the event the opportunity to make the investigation was afforded. I contented myself with accepting the Senator's amendment, because if it is not a valid amendment and can not change existing law, if the commission shall not see fit to acquiesce in it, it will do no harm if incorporated in my amendment, because in that event it would be merely disregarded, of course, as incapable of changing an existing statute.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senate shall go on record as requesting the Federal Trade Commission to do a certain thing and to report to the Senate every 30 days, and the trade commission shall refuse to do that, then, of course, the Senate can take such action as it may choose to take in another direction. We are not precluded from proceeding further if we should be disappointed in any way in the conduct of the trade commission.

Mr. GEORGE. By no means.

Mr. HEFLIN. After the national convention shall have met we will still be in session, and we can go on with this matter and proceed in some other way with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] as modified.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator wish to discuss the amendment at this time?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. GEORGE. I yield the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am very sure the Senator from Virginia would much prefer to proceed to-morrow, and I again give my confident assurance that we will reach a vote early to-morrow. I do not know of any other Senator who desires to speak, except the Senator from Virginia, and perhaps one other Senator here, and then I myself should like to close the debate. I wonder if we can not reach an understanding as to taking a recess at this time?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator agree to unanimous consent to take a vote at 3 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suggested 4 o'clock a while ago, and I would rather say 4 o'clock.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, we can not do that.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator from Washington object?

Mr. DILL. I do.

Mr. WATSON. Does he object to an agreement to a vote at any time to-morrow?

Mr. DILL. I do.

Mr. WATSON. Then, Mr. President, let us proceed.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to say that I very much regret that we can not, in deference to the Senator from Virginia, adjourn or take a recess until to-morrow, so as to allow him to proceed at a more convenient time. I should even have voted for an adjournment, as I would have voted for his motion, if it were not for the fact that I am precisely in the situation that other Senators are on this side who are themselves making objection to any hour to-morrow. I, too, desired to be away, but I concluded that I should remain here until the vote was finally taken. Now, I wish to say to the Senator——

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I see nothing else to do but to proceed with the discussion.

Mr. GEORGE. If we can reach any agreement to vote at any time to-morrow, I shall be glad to vote for an adjournment.

SEVERAL SENATORS. "Vote."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I would be altogether disposed to apologize to the Senate for detaining it in session at this late hour except for the fact that the Senate by 2 votes has itself invited the punishment. I am not disposed to insist upon a recess, if I could have it, because of any appraisal of the value of the brief remarks which I shall submit upon the pending resolution. However, if there be any virtue in aloofness, I may say that I am not among those Senators who have been "marked up" on this proposition and "checked off." I have wanted, if I could, to reach a just conclusion. I have wanted, if I might, to be convinced in the first place of a real necessity for such an investigation as has been proposed; and then, of equal importance, I have wanted to understand under what auspices the investigation should be had. The last is the pertinent matter at this moment.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has proposed an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Montana which would transfer the investigation from a committee of the Senate to the Federal Trade Commission. Albeit I am not fully convinced of the need at this time of any investigation at all, I am irrevocably convinced against the policy of committing such an investigation to the Federal Trade Commission; and should the amendment of the Senator from Georgia prevail I shall vote against any investigation whatsoever, because I am not willing to be among those who will spend the Government's money in a futile fashion.

OUTCRY AGAINST INVESTIGATION

We have heard to-day some remarkable philippics against congressional investigations. It is not the first time that such investigations have been deplored. We heard much of the same kind of talk when Teapot Dome was investigated, and again when the Department of Justice was under grave suspicion. Then, as now, one would have supposed that the investigators were the real culprits, and the persons proposed to be investigated the innocent victims of partisan malice.

Prominent Senators, influential public officials, were averse to the investigations ordered by the Senate some years ago; and one, reading at that time the editorial utterances of the metropolitan press, must inevitably have inferred that the Senate had precipitately entered upon a useless expenditure of public funds for the deliberate exploitation of ambitious politicians among its members. Some gentlemen on that occasion, as others on this, were very dubious as to the desirability of inquiring into the activities of certain public officials. On that occasion, as on this, there were not wanting those to come bravely to the defense of injured innocence. On that occasion, as on this, we were gravely admonished that the procedure should be very circumspect and cautious. Triumphantly, as it seemed, the Senate was reminded that the Judiciary Committee of the other House had, in the case of the suspected Attorney General, utterly refused to present articles of impeachment. Daugherty then, as Humphrey to-day, was pronounced a brave man and honest. Such, indeed, was the aversion to "government by investigation" that the power of the Congress to inquire into the conduct of public officials was sharply challenged and the Senate, in plain terms, was told to mind its own business.

Had the Senate then regarded protests of the precise nature of those to which we have listened to-day, the naval oil reserves would be in possession of the knaves who purchased them from the scoundrels who sold them; and recreant public officials now in disgrace would be still in high favor, exercising the important trusts which they shamelessly betrayed.

MORE THAN COURAGE REQUIRED

The chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, to which body it is here proposed to commit the investigation suggested by the senior Senator from Montana, has been praised for his courage, which nobody has ventured to question. However, Mr. President, it not infrequently has happened that an unworthy person has been applauded for "the courage of his convictions." That threadbare phrase long ago ceased to signify exceptional virtue in the man in whose behalf it is flourished. There are wholly dangerous men who exhibit the courage of their convictions. What is of greater concern in this particular case is to ascertain what are Mr. Humphrey's convictions. I have known men in public life with an abundance of courage who, along with it, had the very basest convictions. Let us get a picture of the chairman of the commission to which we are asked to send this investigation. We may then the better determine the degree of satisfaction which Senators should derive from their boasted aid in putting such a man in a position of great importance and responsibility. Likewise, we may then the better decide the hazard the Senate will take in confiding to such a man a matter of this magnitude and vital concern to the people of the United States.

When Mr. Humphrey was appointed a member of the Federal Trade Commission it was announced, if not by the White House spokesman, with quite as much apparent authority as that gentleman appeared to assume, that he was put on this commission to halt its inquisitiveness, to change the order of its activities, to revolutionize by restraining its methods of procedure. The statement was even made that it was the conviction of the President that this and other commissions should subordinate their judgment to the opinions of the Executive; that they properly were mere agencies of the Executive to register the policies of the administration.

Mr. Humphrey hastened to perform the service for which he was designated; and, in a little while, was asked if he had not made revolutionary changes in the methods and policies of the Federal Trade Commission. Responding to this inquiry by a representative of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Mr. Humphrey frankly said:

> I certainly did make a revolutionary change in the method and policies of the commission. If it was going east before, it is going west now. I would be ashamed to look a decent man in the face and to admit that I did not change the procedure.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. BRUCE addressed the Chair.

Mr. GLASS. Let me get through with this, please, and then I will submit to interruptions.

Mr. GEORGE. I wanted to ask the Senator to whom these statements were made, because I did not hear the interview read yesterday.

Mr. GLASS. It was put in the RECORD by the senior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator give me the page in the RECORD? I want to know what reporter wrote the interview.

Mr. GLASS. The name of the reporter is Mr. Paul Anderson, of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not hear the interview read.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just one minute?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. BRUCE. Is the Senator aware of the fact that Mr. Humphrey has in the last day or two written a letter to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] stating that Judge McCulloch and Mr. Ferguson, the two members who have recently become members of the Federal Trade Commission, had united with him in those changes, as well as the other members of the commission?

Mr. GLASS. Those two gentlemen were not even members of the commission when this interview was given.

Mr. BRUCE. I wanted to ascertain——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Did the Senator refer to me?

Mr. BRUCE. I want to be correct in regard to the matter of time. I received this morning a copy of a letter that had been sent to the Senator from Montana by Mr. Humphrey, in which he referred to certain changes in practice and procedure. He stated that his colleagues had all concurred in those changes, and my recollection is that he mentioned by name both Judge McCulloch and Mr. Ferguson.

Mr. GLASS. I think the two recently appointed members of the commission were not members at the time of which I speak. Mr. Humphrey's colleagues at that time, or some of his colleagues at that time, did unite with him because they were under his complete domination.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I have not received any such letter from Mr. Humphrey, but I am thoroughly conversant with the matter, and the Senator from Virginia is quite right, that all of these changes were effected before either Judge McCulloch or Mr. Ferguson were members of the commission.

Mr. BRUCE. Then it was a different set of changes, perhaps, to which I was referring, from those to which the Senator from Virginia has been referring. That may be.

Mr. GLASS. If I may be permitted to continue, I will exhibit a little more conclusively the spirit and character of this chairman of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, once more I ask the Senator to yield to me for just one minute.

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. If there is no objection, I would like to offer in evidence a copy of the letter to which I have referred.

Mr. GLASS. I hope the Senator will not offer it in my remarks. I do not care to have any letter from Humphrey in my remarks.

Mr. BRUCE. I will withdraw it, and offer it to-morrow, after the Senator shall have concluded.

WHAT HUMPHREY IS THERE FOR

Mr. GLASS. That will be more agreeable to me. Mr. Humphrey was asked by this newspaper writer if the Federal Trade Commission act did not exactly intend—that the commission should collect information for Congress and for the Department of Justice.

I don't think so—was the terse answer.

Mr. Humphrey was reminded that Senator KING had charged him with "packing" the commission's board of review in order to control its decisions, and the astounding answer was:

What of it? Do you think I would have a body of men working here under me that did not share my ideas about these matters? Not on your life. I would not hesitate a minute to cut their heads off if they disagreed with me. What in hell do you think I am here for?

A "board of review" functioning under the suspended axe of a brutal political boss! And that is the temperate, the considerate, the judical-minded gentleman to whose tender care and sense of public service it is insisted the Senate must commit this inquiry. We are asked to confess that it would not be possible to select from the membership of this body five Senators comparable in character, poise and spirit to this finished product of corporation zeal that once found laconic expression in the expletive "The public be damned!"

In defense of the idea of referring this matter to the Federal Trade Commission much has been said about the two new members of the body. I do not for one moment question the character, the capabilities or spirit of either Judge McCulloch, of Arkansas, or Mr. Ferguson, of North Carolina; but they are entirely new, inexperienced members of that commission. They have no familiarity with its processes. I doubt if they have as yet a useful familiarity with its history. Their friends should warn them against the perverted notions and pernicious activity of the chairman of the commission. Why, since their appointment, and without consultation with them, this chairman appeared before the Senate Appropriations Committee and sought to preclude any investigation by this body through the Federal Trade Commission by providing that none of its funds should be expended upon an inquiry ordered by the Senate or the House singly!

That by some people may be called "courage," just as the inquiry, "What in the hell am I here for?" might be called pertinent. I should be disposed to characterize the one as a piece of inexcusable effrontery and the other as a profane expression of contempt for the public interests. And, for one, I am not willing to submit an investigation to a man, however honest or courageous he may be, who has the perverted notion of the divine right of monopoly; who has the vicious habit of thinking that big business can commit no wrong which the legislative body is justified in attempting to remedy.

THE COMMISSION POWERLESS TO INVESTIGATE

Pursuing this line, who are the other members of the commission? The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] had a Methodist experience meeting here to-day which drew from the brethren eulogies of some of the members of the commission; but he did not go far enough. I do not undertake to assail the integrity of Commissioner Myers. I do not recall ever having seen him; but with his preconception of the powers of the commission and, indeed, of the powers of the Senate of the United States, we know how well prepared he is to enter upon an investigation of this sort. He is the gentleman who, it is said, wrote the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States to the effect that the Senate has no right to ask nor the Federal Trade Commission to accede to a request to investigate matters covered by a large part of the pending resolution.

The senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] pointed these things out yesterday to empty seats, just as his colleague [Mr. HOWELL] to-day presented here some of the most startling facts in connection with public utilities to empty seats, showing practically that there has been a "check-off" and that there is no desire for information or for enlightenment upon matters of this kind.

In the opinion alluded to, the Attorney General is on record as saying that the proposed investigation, as embodied in a large part of this resolution, is contrary to the organic act setting up the Federal Trade Commission, and that it has no right to inquire into these things under the law. Concluding his opinion on this phase of the then proposed investigation, the Attorney General said:

There is serious question as to the requirement that the Federal Trade Commission shall ascertain and report the efforts, if any, made by the corporations in question, through the expenditure of money or through the control of avenues of publicity, to influence or control public opinion on the question of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electric energy generated and distributed. The relationship of such facts, assuming their existence, to a charge of violation of the antitrust act is not apparent.

Then, as if to emphasize the whole thing, he said:

Indulging all presumption in favor of the validity of the resolution under the organic act, I am still unable to find authority for such an inquiry.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GLASS. I will yield in just a moment.

Now, we are proposing to refer the investigation to a commissioner, among others, who is indubitably on record as saying that the commission has no authority under the organic law to make any such investigation.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to say to the Senator that I would not have reached the conclusion expressed by the Attorney General under the Norris resolution, but I can see how he did reach it, because I specifically direct the Senator's attention to the fact that all that the Norris resolution did was to ask for an investigation of expenditures of money to control the agencies of publicity to influence public opinion on the question of public ownership of these utilities.

Now, then, there was no specific requirement that the commission determine whether those facts or practices, if true, constituted a violation of law, and it would be difficult indeed to say that the expenditure of money for the purpose of publicity on the question of public ownership could have any real direct or legal relation to monopoly. But the pending resolution, and

I direct the Senator's attention to it, not only recites the same language, but it says "or to influence or control elections."

I have indicated the amendment which I propose to offer. I know that the Senator from Virginia will agree with me that a monopoly can be fostered or created or continued if, by the use of money we elect officers whose duty it is to regulate it, and they, thereby having been corrupted, permit it to go on. So we have a different resolution here. I do not think there is any doubt about the power, but the advisability, the wisdom, or the usefulness of sending it to the commission is of course altogether a different proposition.

Mr. GLASS. Nor would the Senator have reached the conclusion that Mr. Myers, for the Attorney General, actually did reach.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I said very frankly that I would not.

Mr. GLASS. I said the Senator would not have reached that conclusion. I have no reason to assume that Mr. Myers would participate in the view just expressed by the Senator from Georgia. On the contrary, such is my knowledge of the spirit and career of the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission that I am not willing to believe that he would not undertake again to get a confirmatory opinion from the Department of Justice with respect to the Walsh resolution, which comprehends the very things that the Attorney General, in his opinion on the Norris resolution three years ago, said the Trade Commission had no authority, under the organic law, to investigate.

Now the Senator from Georgia proposes to add something which, in his conception of the matter, may give the problem a different aspect. But what does the Senator imagine would ensue? Why, even if the Federal Trade Commission should desire to proceed under the resolution, the corporations which it is proposed to investigate would not be willing. They would sue out injunction after injunction; and there would be many new faces in this Chamber before we would ever reach a conclusion of the matter.

Now let me, just for a moment, pursue my analysis of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator about through?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why not adjourn?

Mr. GLASS. I wanted to adjourn a while ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us adjourn, then.

Mr. GLASS. I am nearly through now.

Mr. OVERMAN. We will make a motion to adjourn and then the Senator can continue to-morrow.

Mr. GLASS. Senators are punishing themselves, and I am punishing myself to continue to-night.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for me to present a motion to take a recess until to-morrow?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I want to make a statement. I want to make it in all fairness. I have asked that the Senate adjourn over until to-morrow in order to accommodate the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and others.

Mr. GLASS. It was not to accommodate me, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. I would be willing to accommodate the Senator by that course. There are some objections made by one or two Senators, as I understand only two Senators, who simply are not willing to have an agreement to vote at any hour to-morrow because they wish to be away.

I say candidly to the Senator that I have been really ill during the entire week and I can not well be here on Friday or Saturday. If I stay here through it all, I do feel that we ought to be able to reach some agreement to vote at some hour to-morrow, even if it is 6 o'clock in the afternoon. I would be glad to have a unanimous-consent agreement to take a recess until in the morning.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that I am perfectly content to go on so far as I am concerned. I had hoped that we would adjourn until to-morrow, however.

Mr. GEORGE. I had hoped so myself.

Mr. GLASS. I had hoped so, in order that I might proceed, not in haste as I have been obliged to do, but deliberately, to the consideration of what I regard as a very grave problem. But the Senate was not willing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think there could be no doubt that we would reach a vote to-morrow.

Mr. GEORGE. There was an objection and it was disclosed to me that the reason was that two Senators had to be away.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think pairs can be arranged for them.

Mr. GEORGE. I think so. I even offered to pair with one of them myself, though I am the author of the pending amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us test the matter by a motion to take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GEORGE. Could we not have a unanimous consent agreement? I think the Senator would wish to be that courteous at least, because I say very frankly I could not be here on Friday or Saturday.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I feel very sure that the vote must come to-morrow.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator is sure of that, why not enter into an agreement?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should not like to suggest a unanimous consent agreement because it is well known that it was stoutly opposed by several Senators who are not now present.

Mr. GEORGE. And who stated that they desired to be away to-morrow.

Mr. GLASS. It looks as if Senators will compel me to speak and then refuse to listen to what I have to say.

Mr. GEORGE. I am staying and am listening with interest to the Senator's address.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator is exceedingly courteous.

Mr. GEORGE. As the author of the amendment I myself am supposed to be paired with one of the Senators who wish to be away to-morrow, but when I state in my place that I can not be here on Friday or Saturday, I think there might be a unanimous-consent agreement to vote some time to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator understands fully that I have repeatedly agreed to a unanimous-consent agreement to vote to-morrow at any time after 4 o'clock, and I am perfectly agreeable to that now, but I do not want to propose that in the absence of Senators who objected very strenuously to such a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well. I wanted to state my position. If it means carrying over the vote to a time when I am unable to be here, I will have to arrange a pair.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator is here to-morrow, I feel sure that we shall get a vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest that we proceed.

Mr. WATSON. I shall object to any sort of an arrangement to postpone the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frazier	McNary	Shortridge

THE THIRD MEMBER OF A TRIUMVIRATE

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, before I was interrupted by the attempt to reach an agreement to vote I was commenting on the composition of the Federal Trade Commission, to which it is proposed to refer the investigation of public utility corporations. I had referred to Chairman Humphrey and paid my respects also to Mr. Myers, who wrote the opinion of the Attorney General, stating specifically that certain important features which are embodied in the pending resolution could not be made the subject of investigation by the Federal Trade Commission.

Then there is a third member of the Federal Trade Commission. I think I have pretty accurate information as to the attitude of that gentleman, obtained from those once associated with him and from others who have observed the pliancy of his mind and the ease with which he is influenced, some say dominated, by the chairman of the commission and the other member to whom I have specifically made reference. He assisted Chairman Humphrey in altering the processes and the methods of the commission. While he is not on record as having used any expletives, while it is not known that he has ever passionately inquired, "What in hell do you think I am here for?" yet he seemed to be there principally for the purpose of concurring with the chairman and the other member of the commission upon whom I have animadverted.

Mr. President, there is the picture; there is the body to which it is proposed to commit this investigation, three of the members already with hostile preconceptions which no amount of evidence, which no testimony of any nature, could be expected to alter. It is a futile proposition. The chairman of the Federal Trade Commission actually voted in the House of Representatives against the establishment of the commission. He does not believe in it as an institution of the Government. He never did believe in its activities before he was made a member, and he altered the whole situation when he was made a member. He was made a member to alter the whole situation. He dominates completely two other members of the commission; or I should more accurately have said that he and a colleague dominate a third member of the commission, and that is a majority of the commission.

How idle it is for us to talk here about committing to the commission an investigation which the commission itself says, under the opinion of the Attorney General, written by one of the commissioners, it has no lawful right to make!

ABOUT PUBLICITY

Mr. President, with respect to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, requiring publicity, clearly we can not have publicity by order of a Senate resolution. The law expressly leaves within the discretion of the commission itself all matters relating to publicity.

Some Senators talk about the "monumental report" that has already been compiled by the Trade Commission, part of it not yet bound. Who in this body ever heard of that report until the Walsh resolution was presented to the Senate? Who ever would have heard of it had not this resolution been presented? It would have found its appropriate place in the musty archives of the Federal Trade Commission, and no human being ever would have known of its existence. Now, that we have the report, of what account is it except as the conclusions of a select group of economists, conscious of the fact that they dare not pursue their inquiries beyond the scope approved by certain members of that commission?

There is not one thing about the report that indicates what questions were asked, conveniently or otherwise. There is not a thing about it to indicate what answers were given; nor do we know, nor can we know from an examination of the report, what questions were conveniently omitted; and then tell me that that is a thorough and convincing report! I am not ashamed, as one Senator, to announce myself totally unconvinced.

As to publicity, the law provides that the commission is authorized—> to make public from time to time such portions of the information obtained by it hereunder, except trade secrets and names of customers, as it shall deem expedient in the public interest.

Mr. Humphrey—Mr. Humphrey!—is to tell us what is expedient for the public interest! Of course he is. "What the hell is he there for?" So that in the last analysis we are gravely proposing here to fool the public and oblige the interests.

Nobody has ever yet accused me of being a congenital enemy of the interests. Rather, I have been classified as an incurable conservative; but that is what is proposed here—to fool the public and immensely to oblige the interests by referring this problem to a commission on record as saying that it has no lawful authority to pursue a great part of this investigation; a commission which, if it were to pursue it, might be relied upon to give such a conclusion of its findings as Chairman Humphrey and two other members have invariably given when big business was at all involved.

As I said in the beginning, so I say in conclusion, I shall not be a party to any such travesty. I shall not vote for any such proposition; and, however desirable or urgent it may be to have an investigation, I shall vote against this resolution if the amendment of the Senator from Georgia prevails. I am not willing to take money out of the Federal Treasury or to impose upon the credulity of the public by voting for an investigation that will, in my conception of the case, be no investigation, and of which we will never hear anything should it be pursued.

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP OF PUBLIC UTILITIES

Mr. President, I am no longer to be frightened, as once I was, by the vehemently expressed hostility of some gentlemen to municipal ownership of public utilities. Like most people of my temperament and nature, I get my preconception of things, and it is exceedingly difficult to alter opinions when once they are fixed. For years I capitulated to the idea that it was a horrible heresy to talk about community or public ownership of public utilities. I began to recover my senses when we entered upon the discussion here of Muscle Shoals, when some people actually wanted to give away a great property, costing the Government of the United States more than a hundred million dollars. Then, by actual personal observation and inquiry, I was confirmed in my dawning belief that a seriously debatable question was involved, and that no intellectual or moral taint attaches to any man who may advocate, in certain conditions and to a certain extent, public ownership of public utilities.

The distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] three years ago presented, from his place in the Senate, surprising revelations with respect to this problem. Unhappily, few Senators listened; and, without meaning offense, I venture to say that few Senators know a great deal about the problem. I happened to have an excess of time on my hands, and read what the Senator said, and he said many things that all of us should know. So it has been to-day, with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] presenting facts and figures of the most significant kind, and Senators coming in and inquiring, "Now, what is he talking about?" and brushing the whole thing aside without hearing a word, without examining a fact or a figure that was presented.

I want to know, and I want an investigation that will inform me about these things. I want the questions comprehended by this resolution submitted to somebody who has not already prejudged the case, and who is not body and soul and mind possessed by those who would discredit public ownership of public utilities in any circumstance.

Why, sir, the Kaiser, up to the moment of his capitulation, had no more zealous belief in the divine right of the Hohenzollerns to rule the Empire than Chairman Humphrey has in the divine right of big business to do anything that big business desires to do; that being my belief, I am not going to waste the Government's money, or compromise my own intellectual integrity, or exhibit a degree of credulity of which I would be ashamed, by voting for a resolution that would commit this investigation to the Federal Trade Commission.

I am sorry, Mr. President, that I could not have proceeded with my part in this discussion in less haste, with a more orderly summation of facts, and a more impressive presentation of the conclusions reached; but Senators know that when they must cut and readjust their line of thought, it necessarily impairs the convincing nature of what they have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], as modified.

Mr. WALSH of Montana (at 7 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, at this time I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NORRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], who is absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT], who is absent. If the Senator from Kentucky were present, he would vote "nay," and if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], who is absent. Not knowing how the Senator from West Virginia would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] is paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. HOWELL (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE]. In the absence of the Senator from Maryland I voted by inadvertence, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FRAZIER. I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 51—as follows:

So the Senate refused to take a recess.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, this is the fourth effort in a short time that has been made to have the Senate either adjourn or take a recess. It seems to me that the temper of the Senate to remain here and take a vote on this proposition should by this time be well understood. So far as I have any influence whatever, I intend to insist on the Senate remaining in session until this question shall have been disposed of.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], and inasmuch as practically the whole debate has turned about that matter it might, as it seems to me, very appropriately be closed by a discussion confined almost exclusively to that question.

The Committee on Interstate Commerce by unanimous vote recommended the adoption of the resolution with the amendments which have already been adopted by the Senate. While the Senator from Georgia has professed a desire, such as expressed by the Interstate Commerce Committee, that an investigation should be had, and his amendment contemplates that the investigation shall be conducted by the Federal Trade Commission, yet the great burden of his argument, and it could not be mistaken, was against any investigation whatever. And that is right, Mr. President. There will be, there can be, no investigation of this question by the Federal Trade Commission. As has already been explained to the Senate, it has been determined by the commission itself, under the advice of the Attorney General, that at least one-half of the investigation can not be conducted by that body, and I want to remind the Senate now that it was so held by the Attorney General not upon the basis of the rider on the appropriation bill but it was specifically declared by the Attorney General in the language that was read by the speaker who last addressed the Senate, and by other speakers, that it was based upon the ground that the organic act itself conferred no such power upon the commission or upon the Senate.

The language of the organic act is perfectly plain. It reads:

> Upon the direction of the President or either House of Congress to investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of any of the antitrust acts by any corporation.

In the case that went before the Attorney General and was under consideration by the commission, it might reasonably have been urged, the particular part of the resolution to which objection was there taken being in immediate connection with the other part of the resolution, which did confessedly refer to violations of the antitrust act, that the whole was to be considered together, and that the latter part of the resolution related to violations of the antitrust act, as well as the first part. But the Attorney General held differently, and held that it did not.

In this particular resolution there is not anything that refers to any violations of any antitrust act. So that the very same arguments that induced the Attorney General, when the matter was before him on the previous occasion, to hold that the latter part of the resolution was without the competence of the Senate or the Federal Trade Commission, must impel the Attorney General to hold that the first part of this resolution is equally without the power of the Senate to direct or the Federal Trade Commission to prosecute.

The Norris resolution consisted of two parts. The first part was a direction to inquire whether the General Electric Co. was a trust in violation of the antitrust act, and the second part a direction to inquire about this other matter, the expenditure of money.

If Senators will take the pending resolution and read it, they will find that there is not a suggestion in it from beginning to end that anybody has violated the antitrust act, and if it were not for the fact that the other investigation had been conducted, no one would undertake to say that it had the remotest reference to any violation of the antitrust act.

Read it! The investigation is to determine—

> (1) the growth of the capital assets and capital liabilities of public utility corporations doing an interstate or international business supplying either electrical energy in the form of power or light or both, however produced, or gas, natural or artificial, of corporations holding the stocks of two or more public utility corporations operating in different States, and of nonpublic utility corporations owned or controlled by such holding companies; (2) the method of issuing, the price realized or value received, the commissions or bonuses paid or received, and other pertinent facts with respect to the various security issues of all classes of corporations herein named, including the bonds and other evidences of indebtedness thereof, as well as the stocks of the same; (3) the extent to which such holding companies or their stockholders control or are financially interested in financial, engineering, construction, and/or management corporations, and the relation, one to the other, of the classes of corporations last named, the holding companies, and the public utility corporations; (4) the services furnished to such public utility corporations by such holding companies and/or their associated, affiliated, and/or subsidiary companies, the fees, commissions, bonuses, or other charges made therefor, and the earnings and expenses of such holding companies and their associated, affiliated, and/or subsidiary companies; and (5) the value or detriment to the public of such holding companies owning the stock or otherwise controlling such public utility corporations immediately or remotely, with the extent of such ownership or control, and particularly what legislation, if any, should be enacted by Congress to correct any abuses that may exist in the organization or operation of such holding companies.

No one has suggested any inquiry at all as to whether there has been any violation of the antitrust act. That matter has already been disposed of by the first report of the Federal Trade Commission and nobody is asking that the matter be opened up again. This is an entirely different inquiry, and when the Attorney General is called upon for an opinion upon the matter as to whether the Federal Trade Commission has power to go into it, he must take the resolution just exactly as it is before him and say whether it is an investigation into violations of the antitrust act or not, and render his opinion accordingly. So that whatever may be said in criticism of the former opinion of the Attorney General, I have no doubt in the world that he will hold, as he must hold, that this is entirely without the scope of the act creating the Federal Trade Commission.

The distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the author of the amendment, calls attention to paragraph (a), being subdivision of section 6 of the Federal Trade Commission act, to the effect that the commission is authorized—> to gather and compile information concerning and to investigate from time to time the organization, business conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce, etc.

That is to say, the Federal Trade Commission has a perfect right to go into that matter if it desires to do so, but entire discretion is reposed in the commission either to go into the matter or not to go into the matter just exactly as it sees fit. The Senate of the United States can not direct it to do anything except in accordance with the provisions of subdivision (d) of the act, upon the direction of the President or either House of Congress to investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust act by any corporation.

So that there is no doubt about the proposition. But the Senator from Georgia said he is going to put the thing past question by adding an amendment to the effect that the Federal Trade Commission is to tell us whether these things constitute a violation of the antitrust act or not. If that can be done, then we can refer any matter to the Federal Trade Commission for investigation by just adding a little clause at the end as to whether the things to be investigated constitute a violation of the antitrust act or not. We might thus refer to them the question of the investigation of the leasing of the oil lands and put a clause on that they shall inquire as to whether the leasing or any acts done in connection therewith are in violation of the antitrust act. Is it possible that anybody can contend that the limitations of the statute can be overcome by any such futile procedure as that? I undertake to say that no lawyer who gives real serious reflection to the subject can say anything except that it is beyond the power of a single House of Congress to confer any such power upon the Federal Trade Commission.

But, Mr. President, let us suppose that this is not sound. Let us suppose that the real correct solution of the matter, the correct interpretation of the law, is such as is given to it by the Senator from Georgia. I want to call attention to a fact not heretofore adverted to, that the Committee on Interstate Commerce, when this matter was before it, was harangued for two hours by lawyers representing some one in opposition to the resolution, arguing and citing cases from the Supreme Court of the United States to the effect that even the Senate of the United States did not have any authority to make the investigation itself. Of course, if the Congress or either House of Congress has not the power to make the investigation, then it can not confer that power upon the Federal Trade Commission or any subordinate organization of the Government.

Therefore, those who do not desire the investigation carried on at all, either by the Senate or the Federal Trade Commission, will unquestionably go to the court and ask an injunction to restrain the Federal Trade Commission from going on with the investigation, first, because neither the Senate nor the Federal Trade Commission can go into the subject at all upon general principles and, second, that it can not go into it because of the restrictions of the organic act of the Federal Trade Commission. Then, as said by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the youngest man in this body will have gray hair before the matter is finally disposed of.

This is not speculation, Mr. President. That is the regular thing when investigations are ordered concerning which there is the slightest doubt about the power either of the Senate to order the investigation or of the Federal Trade Commission to conduct it.

I asked the secretary of the commission to prepare for me a list with appropriate information concerning the injunctions which had been sued out against the Federal Trade Commission to prevent it from conducting investigations in which it was engaged or which it desired to prosecute. He gave me the memorandum, which I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD as an exhibit to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Without objection, that order will be made.

(See Exhibit 1.)

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I refer to the Claire Furnace Co. case, which the Federal Trade Commission started to investigate in the year 1919. It remained in the court until the 18th day of April, 1927, more than eight years, before a final determination was had in the case by the courts. I read:

> On April 20, 1925, the Supreme Court directed reargument, which was had on November 24, 1925, and on April 18, 1927, this court rendered its decision dismissing the bill for want of equity.

That is to say, they held after eight years that the bill of injunction had no equity in it and that the Federal Trade Commission ought long ago, in 1919, to have proceeded with its investigation.

The next case is the Maynard Coal Co. case, remaining in the courts for some three or four years, holding up the investigation by the Federal Trade Commission during that time.

The next case is the Millers National Federation case. On February 16, 1924, the United States Senate by resolution directed the commission to investigate and report to the Senate, among other things, the extent and methods of price fixing, price maintenance, and price discrimination in the flour and bread industries, developments in the direction of monopoly and concentration of control, and all evidence indicating the existence of agreements, conspiracies, and combinations in these industries. They went into court in that case and my recollection is the matter is still pending. The case was argued in the court of appeals on October 3 and 4, 1927, and on October 5, 1927, that court confirmed the decree of the district court. The case has gone to the Supreme Court of the United States and my recollection is it is still pending in that court.

The next case is a proceeding in which the commission sought by mandamus to secure information necessary for economic investigations, and the same procedure was gone through with in that case.

So I undertake to say that whether the Senator from Georgia is right about this matter or whether I am right, whether the commission has the power to go into this investigation or has not the power, it will not proceed until the whole thing goes through the long, dreary, weary way clear up to the Supreme Court of the United States to determine these legal question. It need not be said that the shrewd 184 lawyers who represented the protestants against the resolution are not aware that this opportunity thus to delay proceedings and perhaps eventually to defeat them.

But it has been said, Mr. President, that the investigation ought not to be prosecuted because the Federal Trade Commission has already made the investigation. Of course, if that is true, there is no reason why the resolution, as amended as the Senator from Georgia desires to have it amended, should be adopted. If the investigation has already been made, there is only one rational thing to do, and that is to defeat the resolution for any investigation at all.

What is the fact about the matter? I have here the first report of the Federal Trade Commission, and I refer to the index of that report. I call attention to the nature of the investigation sought to be had here. We want to find out what assets there may be back of the securities these companies are putting out, what bonuses they pay for the sale of them, what commissions enter into the thing, and we want to go into the whole question as to whether these securities are backed by proper revenues of the company or whether they are largely water. Nothing of the kind appears in the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the investigation heretofore made. It had no power or authority under the resolution to go into that kind of thing. All it had power to inquire into was whether there was a power trust in the country, not whether it was issuing securities that were of value, not whether the subsidiary companies were charging rates that were too high to thus bolster up and afford a basis for the issuance of these securities. There is nothing of that kind in the report. I call attention to the index of the first volume:

> Part I. Extent of General Electric control:
> Chapter I. Basis and nature of the inquiry.
> Chapter II. General Electric interests in electric power companies.
> Chapter III. Comparative importance of General Electric power interests.
> Chapter IV. Stockholders in common and interlocking directorates.
> Part II. Development of General Electric interests:
> Chapter V. The Electric Bond & Share Co.
> Chapter VI. American Gas & Electric Co. group.
> Chapter VII. The American Power & Light Co. group.
> Chapter VIII. The Electric Power & Light Corporation group.
> Chapter IX. The Lehigh Power Securities Corporation group.

And so on down the list, without a suggestion concerning the reasonableness of the rates that any of those corporations charge or the value of securities which they issue. I ask that this index may be incorporated in the RECORD as an exhibit to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

(See Exhibit B.)

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So I have before me the later report of the commission. The index of that report likewise carries no suggestion whatever of any investigation such as is contemplated by this resolution. Part 1 deals with "The supply of electrical equipment." It is divided into chapters, as follows:

> Chapter I. Basis and scope.
> Chapter II. Historical milestones in electrical development.
> Chapter III. Electrical manufacturing companies.
> Chapter IV. Growth and profit of the General Electric Co.
> Chapter V. Comparative importance of the General Electric Co.

And so forth, and so forth. No one has called attention to anything in either of these reports which deals with the subject that we are seeking to inquire into by the resolution now under consideration by the Senate. I ask that this index be incorporated in the RECORD as a further exhibit to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The matter referred to will be found as Exhibit No. 3, at the end of the speech of Mr. WALSH of Montana.)

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me inquire whether it is possible to find anywhere anything like the facts that I presented to the Senate on day before yesterday concerning the capitalization of the corporation developing the Mitchell Dam project in the State of Alabama on the Coosa River, showing that out of an investment of $10,900,000, as returned by the company, at least $3,000,000 were thrown out by the auditors of the Federal Power Commission as entirely unwarranted; and yet the great sum of $10,900,000 was to be made the basis of the rates that the people in that locality were to pay for all time to come for the service that was to be rendered from that project. Nothing of that kind will be found in the report of the commission.

Mr. President, I inquire of Senators whether it is not altogether likely that exactly the same process of padding has taken place with reference to many of the corporations that are thus offering their service to the public without any real substantial values back of them?

When this matter was before the Interstate Commerce Committee attention was called to an article appearing in a St. Louis newspaper concerning transactions connected with the Laclede Gas Light Co. of that city. It was disclosed that a man came into that city and, in the short space of two or three years, bought up the Laclede light plant of the city of St. Louis and put out bonds and stock to the amount of something over $4,000,000 that had not a penny of assets back of them. Mr. President, those were circulated and sold to the general public through a banking house in the city of Pittsburgh. The editorial appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of January 17, 1928, in reference to the Laclede Co. is as follows:

WHAT HAPPENED TO LACLEDE?

The Post-Dispatch does not know, and does not pretend to know, what will happen if the State public-service commission permits the City Utilities Co. to purchase 40 per cent of the stock of the Public Service Co.

The Post-Dispatch does know what happened to the Laclede Gas Light Co.

Charles A. Munroe came down from Chicago in 1924 and bought control of Laclede. The price was $5,650,000. He himself put up $1,200,000, and five of his associates supplied the $4,500,000.

Mr. Munroe came to St. Louis with admirable sentiments and pretty words. This was not speculative adventure for him. This was an investment. St. Louis was to be his home. He had left Chicago forever. Such, in substance, was his salutatory. The State public service commission, we imagine, remembers Munroe's pleasing manner and beguiling talk.

What happened? Munroe at once organized a holding company under the name of the Laclede Gas & Electric Co. The only property of that holding company was the common stock of the Laclede Gas Light Co.

What next? With this common stock as its only security, the holding company issued the following securities: Bonds, $4,700,000; preferred stock, $1,260,000; common stock, 200,000 shares.

The next step? Munroe gave the bonds to his five associates to reimburse them for $4,500,000 they had provided in the original purchase. He kept the $1,260,000 of preferred stock to reimburse himself for his original investment. Of the 200,000 shares of common stock, Munroe kept 60 per cent and his five associates got the remaining 40 per cent.

About a year later the five associates sold their $4,700,000 of bonds to the Union Trust Co. of Pittsburgh, which in turn sold them to the investing public.

The status then was: Munroe and his five associates, by possession of the common stock of the holding company, retained controlling ownership of the Laclede Gas Light Co. and it had not cost them a cent. Subsequently they sold this control to another Chicago public-utility magnate at a handsome profit. Munroe cleaned up something like $4,470,000.

Is this typical of holding company financing? We do not say so. But it did happen in the case of Laclede, and if there is anything to prevent similar juggling with our local transportation utility, other than the disinclination of Mr. Newman and his associates to make a lot of money, we should like to know what it is.

This is not unusual, Mr. President; it is not at all unusual. My files are stacked with information of exactly the same character. Indeed, I asserted in the address which I made in the Senate a year ago, and I am informed upon the most reliable authority, that one of the organizers of these great combinations has cleaned up within the last two or three years something like $200,000,000. Of course, either the stocks which were sold to the public have nothing back of them better than water or air, or else the people of the country are obliged to make up the amount in the excess rates which they are obliged to pay for the service of these public utility corporations.

But, Mr. President, it is suggested that there was no showing before the Interstate Commerce Committee warranting this investigation, and when I asserted that there was no one appearing against the resolution and against the investigation except representatives of the very industry that was to be investigated, it was retorted that I did not bring witnesses to testify that the rates were excessive. No; but the committee had before it the address which I delivered here in the Senate, as I said, a year ago, and in that address I showed that the price of the stocks of some of these great holding companies have mounted high within the last few years. Thus, the stock of the American Gas Co. that was quoted in 1921 at 49 went up in 1924 to 140 and in 1925 to 179; the stock of the American Light & Traction Co., quoted at 112 in 1921 was quoted at 249 in 1925; the stock of the American Water Works & Electric Co., quoted at 6 in 1921 went up to 200 in 1925; the stock of the Midwest Utilities Co., the Insull company, quoted at 24 in 1921 mounted to 112 in 1925; the stock of the North American Co., quoted at 46 in 1921 mounted to the almost inconceivable figure of 687 in 1925.

I should say in explanation with reference to the North American Co. that their stock was originally $100 face value and that $100 face value stock was quoted in 1921 at $46 a share. They then split it up into $10 shares, and the $10 shares were in 1925 quoted at $68 a share; in other words, there was an advance from $46 to $680 on the basis of the old stock of 1921. What do those figures indicate? They indicate that the corporations have been making inordinate profits upon their stocks, and therefore the stocks have commanded these high prices in the market.

But, Mr. President, that was not the only evidence submitted to the committee to show that inordinate and excessive prices for service have been charged for and have been received by these companies. There was abundant other evidence. It was in evidence that there had been practically no decline whatever in the price of electrical energy, or something like half a cent per kilowatt-hour, between 1921 and 1925. Yet it is well known that all commodities generally fell in price during that same period something like 60 per cent. In other words, the same money which the public utilities were earning in 1921 would buy in 1925 at least 40 per cent more of the commodities generally purchased than their earnings would buy in 1921. The price of electric service did not go down in proportion to the decline in the price of other commodities, and particularly the price of farm commodities.

More than that, Mr. President, during this time the cost of producing electrical energy was constantly declining, so that the quantity of coal which was required to produce a certain amount of energy in 1920, in 1925 produced something like two or three times as much; in other words, the industry had been established, improved, and perfected; the art had so advanced that the cost of producing electrical energy declined very materially during that time. That is established by facts to which I have called the attention of the Senate, indubitable in character because they come from the census reports of the United States.

But, Mr. President, I offered also to produce, and I can produce before any commission or committee that investigates this matter, a well-informed and capable man for over 10 years in the service of one of these great companies, who will testify from the reports of these companies themselves, that the rates are excessive, and that their net returns are far beyond anything that is necessary in order to secure new money for the purpose of additions, improvements, or new construction.

I did not, however, introduce this evidence before the committee. I could have gone on and supplied a lot of the material that was furnished by the Senator from Nebraska yesterday in his illuminating address, but that would have been to try this matter before the Interstate Commerce Committee.

I reserved that to be presented before the committee to be appointed under this resolution, if the committee was to be appointed, because, of course, all of this would be subject to explanation. Perhaps the apparent effect of it could be overcome. In other words, I was not going to try this matter before the Interstate Commerce Committee. My resolution was to try it before a special committee appointed by the Senate; but I could have gone on, and I could have given some very interesting figures. I could have called attention to the marvelous success that has attended the operation of the municipal light plant at the city of Tacoma, at the city of Los Angeles, at the city of Cleveland, and at the city of Seattle, and I could have compared the prices that are charged by those municipal utilities with the charges of the private corporations operating in the same territory.

I have here a letter from the engineer in charge of the electric-light plant at Tacoma, municipally owned. In this he says—and I shall ask that the entire letter be incorporated in the RECORD:

In my judgment the time has come when a thorough investigation of the power and light industry of this country is imperative; that is, from the standpoint of the people and industries of the country deriving the benefits from our power resources. I am convinced that the cause which affects the high rate structure of practically every privately owned power and light utility lies in the financial set-ups of these companies. You will glean from my articles my version of this particular phase which so greatly affects the industry as it stands to-day.

Then he sent me another letter under date of November 30, 1927, in which he tells me that the average rate for all classes of energy supplied by the city of Tacoma is 1.0427 cents—that is, about 1 1/20 cents—per kilowatt-hour. Is the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] giving me his attention? The rate is 3 cents in Niagara, the Senator tells us. The average rate in the city of Tacoma from a municipally owned plant is 1 1/20 cents.

I ask that these two letters be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

CITY OF TACOMA,
September 26, 1927.

Senator THOMAS J. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am keenly interested to know what you have in mind regarding the instituting of a fight in the coming session of Congress for an investigation of the power industry of this country. I hope you will not think me presumptuous in writing to you and transmitting under separate cover some data which I feel you will be interested in.

I have spent several years in a study of the electric-rate structure of this country, and have prepared a considerable amount of data pertaining to it.

Some months ago I sent to Senator NORRIS some rate comparisons made between the Alabama Power Co. and the municipally owned Power & Light Utility here in Tacoma. This study covers all of the different classifications of service, and I am sending it to you, together with a series of articles written during our last State legislature session at the time we had a power bill before them.

You undoubtedly will be interested in knowing that the city of Tacoma offers the lowest power and light rates found in America. This fact is incontrovertible, and I have in my file the supporting evidence, namely, a comparative rate study of every classification of service in every State in the Union.

In my judgment the time has come when a thorough investigation of the power and light industry of this country is imperative; that is, from the standpoint of the people and industries of the country deriving the benefits from our power resources. I am convinced that the cause which affects the high rate structure of practically every privately owned power and light utility lies in the financial set-ups of these companies. You will glean from my articles my version of this particular phase which so greatly affects the industry as it stands to-day.

If at any time I may be of service to you during the controversy which naturally will be precipitated when a movement of this kind is started, I want you to feel free to call upon me.

We have made considerable progress in the State of Washington along this line and we have in the way of a practical example the cities of Tacoma and Seattle, which is of invaluable support in fighting the rate structure of the private power companies. Taken as a whole, rates are considerably lower in this section of the country than in the eastern section. I attribute this directly to the effort expended in this State, together with the practical demonstration of our publicly owned plants.

Yours sincerely,

KENNETH G. HARLAN,
Public Utility Engineer.

TACOMA, WASH., November 30, 1927.

Senator THOMAS J. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WALSH: Replying to your letter of November 18, or rather to the inclosure dated November 17, which was in answer to my letter of September 26, I am inclosing a table showing the different classifications of service in Tacoma, together with the total revenues derived from each classification and average rate per kilowatt-hour. The commercial lighting classification includes both residential and commercial service. The city of Tacoma did not segregate these classifications until recently—in a few months we will be able to make the segregation between residential and commercial. The commercial power classification includes all power business with an average rate of 6.37 mills. The greater part of the last item, "Energy to other utilities," represents power furnished to the municipal lighting plant of Seattle.

The average rate of 1.0427 cents, which represents the combined classifications of service is, of course, an especially low average rate; moreover, it is a rate that can not be matched by any rate in America, and when we make this statement it is made without fear of successful contradiction, because the exhaustive studies that I have made are conclusive evidence that this rate is not only the lowest rate but is substantially below any other which to-day exists.

The reason for Tacoma's low power and light rates is obvious, and you no doubt are aware of the conditions that have made possible this low-rate structure. Briefly, it can be predicated upon three outstanding conditions: First, a low cost of horsepower (kilowatt development); second, the greater part of the indebtedness has been amortized. At this date the outstanding indebtedness represents less than $30 per horsepower; this may be contrasted with the private power companies' indebtedness, which exceeds $400 per horsepower.

Third, notwithstanding the private power companies' claim that our plant is politically operated and consequently wasteful, our operating expense record purports to show that our power and light system has been operated with exceptional efficiency and low cost per kilowatt output and per kilowatt-hour sold.

The private power companies, in my judgment, will never be able to match Tacoma's rates, because their outstanding indebtedness never diminishes, but constantly increases year after year, which necessitates additional revenues to be secured through the medium of rates to pay interest upon indebtedness which will never be amortized.

In face of Tacoma's low rate, our power and light plant, last year, earned a net of approximately $1,000,000, and notwithstanding a substantial reduction amounting to approximately 17 per cent this year's indications are that our net earnings will exceed $1,000,000.

I have a great deal of data which is, in my opinion, pertinent to your issue, but it is a little difficult to segregate this data and to know exactly what portions would serve you best.

I have sent Senator NORRIS a considerable amount of data, mostly comparative tables of power and light rates. I have compilations for all comparative rates, for all classifications of service, in all parts of the United States. I also have considerable information pertaining to the Ontario Power Commission's operations and pertaining to the regulatory methods and policies of the various power companies operating throughout the United States.

If I can be of further service in the fight you are contemplating you may feel free to call upon me as I am extremely interested in the issue and assure you that I will gladly lend you any support that is in my power to give.

Naturally, because of the struggle we have had in this State over this same issue, we have accumulated a great deal of data and have devoted a great deal of study, not only to the issue as it affects our State, but to the broader principles as they affect the entire Nation.

At an early date I will forward several photostatic copies of the inclosed tables.

Yours sincerely,

KENNETH G. HARLAN,
Public Utility Engineer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. With these letters there came some figures quite like those given to the Senate by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] on yesterday. Mr. Harlan furnished me a table, a comparison of rates charged by the municipal plant of Tacoma, Wash., and the rates charged by the Alabama Power Co.

In Tacoma the contractor for 10 horsepower, or 7.46 kilowatt-hours, gets his power for 1.47 cents. The Alabama Power Co. charges for the same thing 4.38 cents.

For 25 horsepower the city of Tacoma charges 1.47 cents. The Alabama Power Co. charges 3.88 cents.

For 50 horsepower the city of Tacoma charges 1.47 cents. The Alabama Power Co. charges 3.63 cents.

For 200 horsepower the city of Tacoma charges 0.976 cent. The Alabama Power Co. charges 1.1 cents.

So on down the list.

For 20,000 horsepower the rate in Tacoma is 0.377 cent, and the Alabama Power Co. charges 0.853 cent.

In other words, as compared with the Alabama Power Co. the Tacoma rates show a difference in the case of small quantities of power of 198.2 per cent, and in the case of large quantities of power of 126.3 per cent. These figures are the figures given out by the Alabama Power Co. itself as to its territory, while the figures given by Tacoma are fixed by the ordinance of the city of Tacoma.

I ask that this table be incorporated in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was also furnished a schedule of the total revenues from all classes of power, the total number of kilowatt-hours, and, of course, the quotient of the two, the average rate per kilowatt-hour.

For commercial lighting, metered, the rate in Tacoma is 1.91 cents—just a little under 2 cents per kilowatt-hour for commercial lighting.

For commercial power, metered, the rate is sixty-three one-hundredths of a cent.

For municipal street lighting the rate is ninety-two one-hundredths of a cent.

For municipal building lighting the rate is 1.02 cents.

For municipal power the rate is sixty-four one-hundredths of a cent.

For other public and grounds lighting the rate is 1.56 cents.

For other public institutions' power the rate is sixty-six one-hundredths of a cent.

For electrical energy to other utilities the rate is forty-nine one-hundredths of a cent.

The average of all of these is 1.04 cents.

I ask that this schedule be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

KENNETH G. HARLAN,
Public Utility Engineer.

TACOMA, WASH., October 22, 1927.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It appears that out there in the State of Washington they have been having quite a contest between these municipally owned plants of Seattle and Tacoma and the plants of the private corporations operating in the State of Washington, so that a comparison can be instituted between the municipal plants and the private plants operating in exactly the same territory.

Thus, the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. furnishes light for Seattle in part, Bellingham, and Everett. Its average rate is 1.64 cents.

In Tacoma the rate is 1.24 cents.

In Spokane the rate is 1.86 cents.

The rate of the Grays Harbor Railway & Light Co. is 3.53 cents.

The rate of the Yakima-Walla Walla system is 3.69 cents.

Walla Walla pays 4.37 cents.

Yakima pays 4.18 cents.

Pomeroy pays 6.15 cents.

Portland, Oreg., pays 2.03 cents.

I offer for the RECORD the article in which this schedule appears.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TACOMA RATES ARE LOWEST IN THE STATE—POWER COSTS LOCAL USERS ONE-THIRD LESS THAN IN SEATTLE AND ONE-HALF LESS THAN IN SPOKANE; YAKIMA STILL HIGHER

[The second of a series of articles on the Metcalf power bill from the city's standpoint.]

By Kenneth G. Harlan, public-utility expert for city of Tacoma

The electrical rate structure of this State has been subject to much controversy. Rate comparisons have repeatedly been made in support of divers contentions. However, the ordinary rate comparison is of little value, for there are points in any rate structure that can easily be chosen which will purport to show to the advantage or disadvantage of each respective utility. In order to make proper comparisons, various factors must be given due consideration; for instance, a comparison based upon a consumption of electricity at an extremely low point, or vice versa, carries an erroneous impression because of the fact that only a small per cent of service falls within its scope.

Proper and fair comparisons can only be made upon energy consumption falling in the zones which represent the bulk of service. Also comparisons are often made upon certain schedules which represent only a small portion of service such as special power rates applicable to a small restricted classification. Obviously, such comparisons, while they may be properly computed, are void of any material importance, nor can they be seriously considered when true comparison of rates are sought.

A method of rate comparison, however, which is accurate and true, is the comparison of the total amount of energy sold to customers divided into the gross revenues received therefrom which results in an average rate. Such computations can either be based upon each schedule or by combining all schedules. Space will not permit comparisons of each schedule; therefore, comparisons of combined schedules must suffice.

AVERAGE POWER RATE

The foregoing computations are based upon the combined amount of energy served annually to all classifications of business divided into the total revenue received, which gives the average rate of kilowatt-hour, and which in the last analysis reveals the true status of the rate structure, irrespective of what may result in the comparison of rates at certain points or in certain schedules or classifications of service. It is interesting to note the low average rate given by the city of Tacoma as compared to the average rate per kilowatt-hour for power companies. The following tables will emphasize to a greater extent the pronounced difference which exists:

Seattle, Everett, and Bellingham (year 1925)

257,204,373 kilowatt-hours, at 1.6488 cents (Seattle, Everett, Bellingham)	$4,240,998.60
257,204,373 kilowatt-hours, at 1.2431 cents (Tacoma)	3,197,307.56
Savings based on Tacoma average rate	1,043,691.04

From the above table it is apparent that had the cities of Seattle, Everett, and Bellingham enjoyed the average rate which Tacoma gives to her people and industry, those cities would have been saved $1,043,691.04, or, putting it another way, these cities paid an average rate which was 33 per cent greater than that of Tacoma. The foregoing computations are based upon the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. rates, and do not include Seattle's city light plant.

Spokane (year 1925)

123,928,714 kilowatt-hours, at 1.8663 cents (Spokane)	$2,321,872.92
123,928,714 kilowatt-hours, at 1.2431 cents (Tacoma)	1,540,557.84
Savings based on Tacoma average rate	772,315.68

If Spokane had Tacoma's average rate, it would have saved to its people and industry $772,315.08, or, in other words, its average rate was 50 per cent above the average rate paid in Tacoma. According to information at hand, this sum which would have been saved to the city of Spokane alone equals very closely the total amount of taxes paid to the State of Washington by all of the private companies on their power and light properties. But the people of Spokane apparently are satisfied with their rates; Mr. Post, general counsel for the Washington Water Power Co., stated before a public legislative hearing at Olympia a few days ago that the people in his section had their feet on the ground and that the Spokane rates were the lowest in the State.

PEOPLE SATISFIED

Mr. Post surely did not expect such remarks to be taken seriously, although, apparently, such glittering generalities have served their purpose in his locality, but it is wondered if the people of Spokane really knew the true rate conditions whether or not they would continue to keep their feet "firmly upon the ground." Spokane has always been in a strategic position in respect to electric power; that city was endowed with a wonderful waterfalls in the heart of its business district. Seldom, if ever, has there been a city gifted in such a way; but has the city of Spokane or its industry capitalized this gift? The answer is obvious, for its people and its industry are paying rates 50 per cent above those paid in Tacoma, where energy is transmitted for many miles. Some day, we venture, the people of Spokane will get their feet off the ground at least long enough to peer over the almost impenetrable propagandic wall that has been built around them and view the power situation in its true light.

Portland (year 1923)

301,631,116 kilowatt-hours, at 2.0377 cents (Portland)	$6,146,401.24
301,631,116 kilowatt-hours, at 1.2431 cents (Tacoma)	3,749,576.40
Savings on Tacoma's average rate	2,396,824.84

Tacoma's average rate would have saved to the people and industry of Portland in the year 1923 $2,396,424.84. This represents more than the combined taxes of all the utilities, electric, railway, water, and gas in the entire State of Oregon.

Yakima (year 1923)

13,562,740 kilowatt-hours, at 4.19 cents (Yakima)	$567,399.91
13,562,740 kilowatt-hours, at 1.2431 cents (Tacoma)	168,598.42
Savings based on Tacoma average rate	398,801.49

Had the people in Yakima enjoyed Tacoma's average rate they would have saved to that community $398,801.49. It would be unfair to the private power companies to contend that Tacoma's average rate should be in effect in Yakima. It is fully recognized that it costs more to serve in a sparsely settled district than it does in a densely populated territory. The significance of this situation is thoroughly realized and proper consideration has been allotted to it. However, it can not be recognized to the extent of the existing rate differentials or to an average rate of more than three times that which is paid in Tacoma.

The people in the Yakima district, in the event that the Metcalf power bill becomes a law, could build a "tie line" to the closest point in the system now owned and operated by the municipally owned plants, purchasing their energy from this source and thereby would be able to enjoy a rate much less than that which they are now paying to the private power company. Then surely this matter must bear a close relation to the proposed power issue. The opinion has been expressed that the matter of rates is irrelevant to the Metcalf power bill and that rates have no relation to taxes. It seems absurd that anyone who has given serious thought to this subject could fail to recognize the existing relation.

(The succeeding article will be given to a discussion of the reasons why municipally owned and operated plants are able to sell at a lower rate.)

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then in the controversy had out there it was represented, as has been so often represented, that of course the municipal plant does not pay any taxes, and therefore it can afford to offer its service and its energy at a less rate than the privately owned corporation; but the gentleman who runs the plant out there, Mr. Kenneth Harlan, an eminent engineer, takes up that matter in a discussion, and shows that the amount of taxes paid by the private corporation, distributed proportionally in its business, makes practically no difference whatever in the total rate per kilowatt-hour. In other words, if the amount paid for taxes per kilowatt-hour produced were added to the rate charged by the municipality, it would still be very materially less than the rate charged by the private corporation.

I ask that Mr. Harlan's article on that subject, and two other articles by him on the same general topic, be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXPERT DISCUSSES METCALF MEASURE—RELATION OF COST OF ELECTRIC POWER TO TAXES PAID BY PRIVATE COMPANIES EXPLAINED BY TACOMA PUBLIC-UTILITY ENGINEER

By Kenneth G. Harlan, public-utility expert for city of Tacoma

(In the following article, Mr. Kenneth G. Harlan, public-utility expert for the city of Tacoma, sets forth the reasons, from the city's standpoint, why the legislature should pass the Metcalf power bill.)

Misapprehension concerning many aspects of the proposed power measure now before the State legislature appears prevalent not only in the minds of a great many citizens of this State but also among the majority of our legislators at Olympia, as well as newspaper correspondents at the statehouse. From numerous sources, and particularly those emanating from Olympia and through various newspapers, inference has been given that the proponents of the power measure have failed to present material or relevant facts in support of the power bill.

Such an impression, particularly when left with members of the legislature and broadcast through the columns of the public press, manifestly creates a reaction which is not in keeping with the true facts, but which undoubtedly is very gratifying from the standpoint of the private power interests.

The writer is somewhat curious to know just what facts are considered pertinent or relevant to this issue. It is true that if all the facts and data presented by the proponents of the power measure are to be ridiculed, belittled, and even contorted, then as a natural consequence the glittering generalities propounded by the principals and sympathizers of the private power interests will continue to influence the minds of the legislators at Olympia, as well as a great many voters in this State.

As a result of such clever manipulation and subterfuge, misconception prevails and it is because of this condition the writer has submitted to set forth in the columns of the newspapers certain concrete figures and facts which it is hoped will deal with this State's power issue in a comprehensive and relevant manner. The figures used in these articles have been taken directly from the books and records of the respective power companies in this State. Therefore they are in reality their own figures, and must be incontrovertible; the conclusions are the natural results of the figures themselves. Admittedly, statistics and figures are tiresome and uninteresting to a great many; they lack "emotional appeal," but it is imperative from a standpoint of equitable and fair determination of the power issue that concrete figures and facts, rather than phrases and generalities, be the influencing factors in the disposition of such an issue.

FACTS AVAILABLE

There is available in this State to-day a mass of condensed figures and facts that are not only pertinent and relevant, but relate directly to the power measure; they are not only available, but have been offered to the legislative bodies of this State; their authenticity and propriety may readily be determined through the department of public works, located within a few steps from the legislative halls. Earnest appeal is made to every member of the 20th session of the legislature entreating them to give this issue an open-minded and unbiased opinion; to analyze to a final conclusion the records which may be had; then when the roll is called upon Senate bill 159 to discharge their duties to the people of this State in a courageous manner, predicated upon thorough knowledge of the material facts.

Irrespective of the outcome of this bill, the power issue will remain a live issue, and with little doubt, if it fails in this session of the legislature, will again be carried to the voters of this State, where in the past two years its support has grown with such increasing intensity that its approval by the people seems assured. For this reason, if for no other, the legislature should attempt to solve the power problem at this time and, if failing in a solution, should refer it to the people of this State at the next general election.

The power issue as it now stands before the State legislature in the form of the Metcalf power bill is not new. In substance it is the same issue that has been before this State for many years, and obviously it will remain a paramount issue until such time that a law is placed upon the statute books which will permit the people to enjoy a competitive field in the power and light industry. The proposed Metcalf power bill would give cities a right to compete with private power companies outside of their corporate limits for a distance of 10 miles. It would give the right to purchase to any other city or governmental agency owning its own distribution system situated within 50 miles of the corporate limits or 25 miles of a transmission line connecting a city with this power plant. Such city or town would likewise be permitted to sell electrical energy within 10 miles of its corporate limits.

During the Bone power bill campaign in the year 1924 the private power company speakers on numerous occasions vigorously contended that it was not competition they feared. They boasted of their efficiency in power production and distribution and condemned in no uncertain terms the efficiency of what they branded "politically managed plants." They averred that their real objection to a power measure of this kind was not because of competition but because of the unfairness in taxing their business while the competing cities would go tax free.

Apparently these contentions were not made in good faith, for it now seems obvious that no matter what kind of a power bill might be submitted if it conferred the right to cities to enter the territory that the private power companies call "our territory" such would meet with just as bitter opposition from the private power interests. This fact is borne out in the present Metcalf power bill, which would cause a 5 per cent tax to be levied upon gross operating revenues, yet notwithstanding this tax, which was proposed for the purpose of placing competition upon a parity so far as taxes were concerned, it is very apparent that just as vigorous opposition is manifested by the private power interests as there was against the Bone bill, which did not carry a tax at all.

It may be contended that the proposed tax of 5 per cent in the Metcalf power bill is insufficient and possibly not equal to that which the private power company pays. The question of taxes which should be imposed on gross sales in order that it be comparable to that paid by the private companies was a subject of careful consideration, and it was found that 5 per cent corresponds very closely to the actual taxes paid to the State of Washington upon power and light properties. The following figures are set forth in support of the foregoing statement. These figures were taken directly from the books of the Pacific Power & Light Co. and show the exact amount of taxes it paid to the State for the year 1923:

Real and personal taxes	$80,732.25
Gross operating revenues	1,649,679.02

Taxes equal 4.89 per cent of gross operating revenues.

From the above figures it is apparent that the Pacific Power & Light Co., which operates in the entire southeastern section of this State, actually paid to the State a tax of 4.89 per cent, based on its gross sales; yet, in face of this fact, the said company furnished its share of the propaganda that has been broadcast to the remotest corner of this State, declaring that the private power company paid $10 in taxes to the State out of every $100 that they received in gross revenues. In order that the writer's statements may not be construed as "mere conversation," the following excerpt from a pamphlet issued in the year 1924 is presented:

"CLAIM TO PAY 10 PER CENT

"Few citizens of the State realize that the power company, according to law, pays 10 per cent of its gross revenues into State taxes and is therefore one of the heaviest taxpayers of the State. In the southern section of the inland empire the Pacific Power & Light Co. pays a total of $103,000, while in the Walla Walla district alone the taxes amount to $41,000."

To emphasize the absolute disregard this private power company had for veracity, attention is directed to the actual taxes paid in Walla Walla County in the year 1923, which amounted to $8,616.25, as compared to the $41,000 that appears in the published statement, and 4.89 per cent as a combined tax paid to the State instead of 10 per cent as claimed. The Puget Sound Power & Light Co. has persistently set before the public the statement that out of each $100 received in operating revenue they pay $8.86 to the State in taxes.

This tax appeal has drawn to them a great many supporters, but because the statement is only half true, the argument based upon it should have nothing to commend it. It seems pertinent at this time, in order that the tax statement of the private power companies be clarified, to again ask these companies to allocate these taxes to their different holdings; render a statement to the legislature of this State, showing what portion of the $8.86 out of every $100 represents Federal income tax, taxes on electric-railway systems, coal mines, bus lines, and other allied enterprises.

It seems high time that the State should know the exact facts relating to these taxes which the private companies claim they pay, for the thing which seems most relevant at this time is the amount of taxes that the private power interests pay upon their power and light properties in this State. By virtue of the actual case of the Pacific Power & Light Co., it seems reasonable to assume that the taxes paid by Stone-Webster and the Washington Water Power Co. should be very close to those paid by the Pacific Power & Light Co., which amounted to $4.89 out of every $100 in revenue, instead of the $10 which they claim.

FIVE PER CENT TAX SUFFICIENT

In further support of the 5 per cent tax proposed in the Metcalf bill, it is found that in the year 1925 the private companies of this State received in gross revenues from the sale of electrical energy $17,346,097. Five per cent of this equals $867,304.85. It would seem that this figure could be used to advantage by the legislature; if it is found by them that the actual taxes paid to the State by the private power companies upon their power and light properties exceed this figure, then some fault might be found with the Metcalf power bill.

On the other hand, if it is found that the taxes paid by the private power companies are in the proximity of the $867,304.84, it would indicate that the tax feature in the Metcalf power bill is equitable and fair. The only case where allocation has been made public to the writer's knowledge was in the case of the Pacific Power & Light Co. above referred to, which strongly supports the 5 per cent tax.

Looking at the tax question from another angle, the Yakima-Walla Walla region in the year 1923 furnished 23,000 customers for the private power company. Predicated upon the aforementioned taxes paid by this company, it is found that each customer paid for the company in their power and light bills an average tax of $3.33 per customer per year. For many years the patrons of this power company were dissatisfied with rates prescribed and in the year 1925, after a hard-fought battle on rates before the regulatory body of this State, and after municipal development had been threatened, an annual reduction of $250,000 was secured. Compare this savings to taxes. The savings resulting from the rate fight, based upon customers, amounted to an average of $10.87 per customer per year, or more than three times the amount of the charge for taxes.

TAX COLLECTORS

I say "charge" for taxes, because it must be admitted that the private power companies in reality do not pay taxes. They are tax collectors, but the taxes are paid by their customers, for the reason that they are not on a competitive basis, but, instead, fall under State regulation, which permits them to earn a fair rate of return after all operating expenses and taxes are deducted.

Aberdeen is another case where the mere threat of municipal development brought down the rates of the private company so that the savings represented many times what the taxes were. If, in the case of southeastern Washington, $10.87 per customer each year could be saved through an organized fight and through a mere gesture toward a publicly owned plant, and if the city of Aberdeen by mere threat of municipal development could force rates down so that the savings in these respectives districts equaled many times what the taxes paid by them for the private power company amounted to, then what would be the effect of the Metcalf power bill upon not only certain districts in this State, but upon every district? It seems reasonable that rates would immediately be reduced by the private power companies to a level where there would be no incentive on the parts of various districts to seek competition through "tie line" service from the municipally owned plants.

In the event that such assumptions are correct, what would be the effect of a small reduction in rates? In the year 1925 there was served to the people and industry of this State by the private power company, in round figures, 990,000,000 kilowatt-hours. Assuming that the effect of the Metcalf power bill would result in a reduction of only 1 mill, or one-tenth of 1 cent, per kilowatt-hour, the savings to power and light consumers in this State now receiving service from the private companies would be $990,000.

FINANCING CAUSES HIGH POWER RATES—BONDS AND STOCK ISSUED ON "HOPES" AND GOOD WILL MUST PAY DIVIDENDS TO PARENT COMPANY—ORIGINAL COST NEVER AMORTIZED

By Kenneth G. Harlan, public-utility expert for city of Tacoma

After more than 30 years of municipal ownership, the city of Tacoma has to-day reached a preeminent position in the power and light industry of this Nation. Preeminent because it has given to its people and its industry the lowest power and light rates in America, and at the same time experienced substantial net earnings which last year amounted to approximately $1,000,000 for the current period; second to none in the character of its hydroelectric developments and in its transmission and distribution, it stands before the power industry of this country as a challenge to all private power interests whose rates and charges are all that tariffs will bear, and which have made the people and industry of their domains the economic slaves of an Eastern financial combine—and those are not mere words. If it is thought so, ask yourselves this question: Why are Tacoma's rates lower than those of the private power interests?

Why can this city sell for less? That rates are lower is incontrovertible, but for what reason? Why? That is the question which stands out persistently in the minds of many at this moment. Acute controversy prevails throughout the State concerning this matter. The question has been asked: "Is it because the private companies pay taxes where the city plants do not"? No—that apparently is not the reason; possibly few realize that Tacoma's power and light plant pays each year to the general fund a 5 per cent tax based upon its gross revenue, which last year amounted to more than $80,000, and which appears equivalent to the taxes paid by the private power companies upon their "power and light" properties in this State.

Is it, then, because the municipally owned plants can operate more efficiently? It is doubtful if they should, although apparently they do, for under State regulation there is little incentive for the private companies to maintain management and overhead costs within the bounds of reason; only in a competitive field will minimum overhead costs and efficient management of private companies prevail, but under State regulation a public utility is allowed a fair return upon its "rate base" after all expenses, taxes, and depreciation allowances are deducted, and invariably the "rate base" carries large intangible values representing "water rights," "development costs," "going-concern values," and even good will. However, efficient operation, while important, is not the primary reason why Tacoma rates are lowest.

FINANCING IS REASON

The prime reason apparently lies in the methods and policies of the private power utilities in financing their business, notwithstanding the policy of State regulation, which in theory permits earnings based only upon "prudent investment."

No comment upon public utility finance could omit consideration of the age-old charge of stock watering; that is to say, the overissues of securities in proportion to the actual investment. By way of concrete illustration: In the year 1910 an eastern syndicate invaded a certain section of this State, purchasing all of the power and light properties in that particular region. The actual price paid for these properties was $3,600,000, after which $1,900,000 was spent in additions and betterments, making a total cost of $5,500,000. Within a year these same properties were turned over to a member of an eastern Power Trust whose opening entry upon its books for said properties was $10,900,000, against which stocks and bonds were issued, and which has been increased from time to time until to-day the book values exceed $23,000,000, with a corresponding amount of stocks and bond issues.

In other words, the original cost was "stepped up" from $5,500,000 to $10,900,000 and excess issues of stock floated upon what might be called "hopes"; the particular menace of such practice lies in the fact that the parent company which, in this case, as usual, is an eastern concern, looks to its subsidiary in the field to secure through the medium of rates sufficient revenue to forever pay interest upon these stocks and bonds which are issued in excess of the actual physical value of the property.

MUNICIPAL PLANT PAID FOR

The foregoing emphasizes the overextended condition existing with at least some of the private power utilities that are operating in this State, but even with those utilities whose outstanding stocks and bonds do not exceed the fair value of their property, if such a case exists, then it must be admitted that even these stocks and bonds will never be diminished or amortized. On the contrary, they will be constantly increased as plant additions are made, and the public must forever pay through the medium of rates, interest, and dividends upon this investment.

This condition presents itself in strong contrast with the municipally owned plants and obviously is the chief reason why Tacoma's rates are substantially lower and will always be lower than those of the private power companies, for in the case of the municipally owned plant eventually its indebtedness is amortized and the plant is paid for. It is then permissive to reduce rates to a level where revenue is only required for operating expenses, maintenance, and a depreciation reserve.

The power interests in the Puget Sound region have never failed of opportunity, both through the medium of advertising and vocal utterance, to direct an attack against the $19,000,000 in bonds outstanding against Seattle's city light plant, implying what a tremendous burden it is upon the taxpayers of Seattle, but they fail to ever mention the $119,000,000 in stocks and bond issues outstanding against their properties—and the singular thing about this is that these stocks and bonds will never be retired. The $19,000,000 of bonds against Seattle's municipal plant has been reduced through amortization from a much greater sum.

LOWER RATES

Ultimately this entire debt will be wiped out, which will result in additional rate reductions, and which, in turn, will force, through competition, the private company to follow suit. Eventually Seattle's plant will be paid for, all from earnings, such as has been experienced in Tacoma, where the last of the bonds against the La Grande power plant were paid off and then burned at a public jubilee.

If Tacoma's municipal plant was owned by the private power interests, it is reasonable to assume that at least $15,000,000 worth of stocks and bonds would be outstanding against it. Based on 7 per cent interest, it would be necessary to raise rates in Tacoma so that an additional revenue could be secured to pay $1,050,000 in interest on the said $15,000,000. This is based on the assumption that no bonds were now outstanding.

The recent $4,000,000 issue of bonds against the new Cushman plant, which will be amortized in a few years, would result at this time in a difference of $280,000, or, instead of the $1,050,000, the additional amount in rate increase required would be $770,000—bearing in mind that the city borrows its money at an interest rate of 5½ per cent, whereas the private company borrows mostly from its customers through "customer stock sales" at an interest rate of 7 per cent.

A widespread criticism of the unwarranted complexity of the financial set-up of these companies, particularly the top companies that feed off of the earnings of their progeny, is not without foundation. The capital structure of one of these "top-holding" companies was recently characterized by Barron's Weekly—assuredly a competent critic—as "a financial nightmare."

Thus, because of the methods of "high finance" followed by private power utilities, many States require that such utilities be conducted by domestic corporations, else they be denied the enjoyment of such rights as that of eminent domain.

SELL STOCK TO CUSTOMERS

For several years past the private power interests have persistently and elaborately set before the public the advantages of stock sales to customers. By this device of "customer ownership," as it is called, an almost inexhaustible reservoir of new capital became available, and this in turn became highly provocative for the financing of new adventures without any need of seeking capital through regular channels that might insist upon adequate securities. Consequently, because of the advantage that these companies were quick to grasp through the sale of customer stock, they have been able to finance a large portion of their enterprises from this source, with the result that in reality the people through the purchase of this customer stock, have loaned the money to build these properties, but they have no voice in its affairs nor are they conferred with any voting power; the common stock, which is invariably held by the financial combines of the East, hold full power of control; as W. Z. Ripley, professor of economics at Harvard University, states: "It is probably true in most cases that the controlling common stock of the banking or management firm standing at the head of the utility hierarchies already instanced practically represents no actual investment in first instance."

The plain truth, then, appears that the people furnish the capital to build the enormous outlays; the big power combines issue the controlling common stock to themselves, apparently in payment for "intelligent promotion," and then seek rates of a character sufficiently high to pay to themselves dividends and interest upon these stock issues that in most cases cost nothing and represent nothing.

Customer stock sales have grown in such astounding proportions in the past few years that at this writing, according to statistics, approximately 1,307,000 customers of public utilities are shareholders in their respective companies, and it is reported that the sales of securities direct to customers in the year 1925 amounted to $296,000,000.

A concluding thought on customer ownership: If it is desirable for 1,307,000 customers to own the greater part of these public utilities, would it not be infinitely better for all of the people to own all of this business, thereby dispensing with the tribute now being paid to these eastern masters of finance who have built one of the greatest monopolies known to this generation? Is there anything wrong with such reasoning, and is it clear to us why Tacoma's power and light plant, which is owned entirely by the people, is able to serve its citizens and its industry at so low a rate?

Now, regarding the relevancy of these matters to the Metcalf power bill: It should be apparent and can be consistently argued that so long as there are millions of dollars represented in outstanding stock issues far in excess of real property value, the rate structure of the private power companies will continue to remain excessive, for through the ingenuity of its experts and public-relations men, which it must be admitted are well chosen, they will continue to present seemingly logical reasons which will exert sufficient influence to permit a rate that will serve their needs, for there is no group in the State of Washington, or in the Nation, that is in closer touch with regulation or with the members of our legislature than is this group who represent the private owner interests. Only through a power measure such as the Metcalf bill is this situation likely to be altered, and only then by forced regulation through the natural laws of competition.

It is not the writer's intention to convey the impression that the present directing heads of our department of public works are other than competent or conscientiously discharging the duties of their office, but it must be admitted, for records in the State department speak for themselves, that too often in the past rates have been predicated to a great extent upon theoretical factors injected by experts of the private interests, wherein the lines of demarcation between the theoretical and actual failed to be recognized. Moreover, the department of public works has been hampered in its effort to efficiently regulate the public utilities of this State because of lack of jurisdiction. A recent rate case, now before the supreme court, strongly supports this statement, the details of which will be set forth in a succeeding article.

POWER COMPANIES' VALUATIONS HIGH—PRIVATE CORPORATIONS LISTED AT $435.33 PER HORSEPOWER, AS COMPARED WITH $42.55 FOR TACOMA MUNICIPAL PLANT

By Kenneth G. Harlan, public-utility expert for city of Tacoma, Wash.

In preceding articles the writer has endeavored to present three distinct phases pertaining to the power issue, each in its relation to the Metcalf bill. First, that the proposed 5 per cent tax on gross sales is comparable to the taxes now being paid to the State by the private power companies upon their power and light properties; second, that the municipally owned power plants are serving electrical energy at a rate far below that of the private-power companies, and that legislation such as the Metcalf power bill would permit competition, which in turn would effect rate reductions over the entire State, resulting in a savings many times the amount of taxes now being paid upon power and light properties. Third, that the complex financial structure of the private utilities which leads up through a chain of holding companies to a New York or Boston parental throne has rendered it impossible for the private power companies to prescribe rates to match those prescribed by the municipal plants, and at the same time procure sufficient revenue to pay interest and dividends upon overissued securities, which, unlike the municipally owned plants, are never amortized.

In the State of Washington there are 75 private power and light utilities, of which, based upon operating revenue, 88 per cent represents three major holdings; that is, Puget Sound Power & Light Co., Washington Water Power Co., and the Pacific Power & Light Co., leaving only 12 per cent representing the remaining 72. The aggregate book value of these properties at the end of the year 1925 amounted to $228,000,000. But it can not be seriously contended that their physical value equals anything near this sum, although there is little doubt but that the full amount in stocks and bonds are outstanding againt these book values.

The private power companies have developed in this State 390,850 kilowatts, or 523,739 horsepower. Based on the $228,000,000, this equals $583.34 per kilowatt, or $435.38 per horsepower. Compare this to the indebtedness per horsepower outstanding against the municipally owned plants, which amounts in Seattle to $146.53 per horsepower, and in Tacoma to $42.55 per horsepower. The Puget Sound Power & Light Co. costs per horsepower, based on their outstanding stocks and bonds, equals $420.18, which is very close to the figure first quoted, representing the combined private utilities. The striking contrast existing between the private and municipal utilities should emphasize again the importance of such legislation as the Metcalf power bill.

RATE BASE VALUES

The aggregate rate base values fixed by the State Department is unknown, for, as in the case of the Puget Sound Power & Light Co., some of the rate base values have not been established. All the eastern Washington utilities and those located in remote districts have been subjected to rate base determinations; the Puget Sound Power & Light Co. being practically the only exception in the State, and it is obvious why it has not been necessary to establish a rate base for the regulation of this major utility; it is serving Seattle upon a strictly competitive basis, which district represents close to a third of the State's population, and this in itself is the strictest kind of regulation. Other surrounding territory is so located that rates are to an extent effected by the established tariffs in the competitive fields.

Consequently this utility has never, in a stricter sense, fallen under State regulation, although there are points on the east slope of the Cascades and in sections not adjacent to Seattle and Tacoma where stricter regulation no doubt would be welcome; and even in the adjacent territory if placed upon a competitive basis, undoubtedly many schedules would be reduced. The fact in itself that a portion of the Puget Sound Power & Light Co.'s business is not really being regulated by the State, but instead through the natural laws of competition, should strongly emphasize the need of the Metcalf power bill, which would accomplish this very thing not only for Seattle and Tacoma, but for the entire State of Washington.

STATE REGULATION

The following excerpt from a recent article written by W. Z. Ripley, professor of economics at Harvard University, reads: "The last serious indictment against the overdeveloped holding corporation in the public-utility field has to do with rate regulation. Under the terrific involution of accounts it may become practically impossible to allocate costs and to determine earnings as related to the investment. The holding company is exposed to the temptation to exploit its subsidiaries, taking its own profit by undue enhancement of the operating expenses of the local concerns. Alpha Co., the operating concern, apparently runs at a loss, while Omega Co., which holds its stock, pays dividends nevertheless. Such things may be accomplished by overloading management expenses. 'Too many crossed wires' was the newspaper headline applied to the Massachusetts public utilities decision in 1916, when something like $240,000 out of its total expenditures of $318,000 was paid by the North Adams Gas Light Co. to the Light, Heat & Power Corporation of West Virginia for current supplies, construction, and management. How easy for the interstate holding company to dilute earnings in order that they may become digestible in the public view; and how difficult in a massive hierarchy of such holding companies to trace anything like costs in relation to investment back to some solid bench mark. How difficult to pass upon the reasonableness of contracts for use of property or sale of power. This, too, has recently been brought to the attention of the Massachusetts Legislature. Proceedings degenerate under such circumstances into a mere muzz of words."

STATE REGULATION IMPOTENT

In preceding articles reference has repeatedly been made to State regulation. To discuss the many ramifications connected with this subject would require voluminous text. Therefore, in order to show the impotency of State regulation, a mere citation of two instances must suffice: The case of the Department of Public Works v. The Pacific Power & Light Co. (Cause No. 5689). After an elaborate preparation of evidence, this case came to a hearing before the regulatory body of this State, where it was found that the contentions of the complaining cities to the effect that the rate base of this company, upon which rates were predicated, or, in other words, the value upon which the people through rate charges must pay a return, included $873,922 worth of property situated in Oregon, and that for years people in both the States of Washington and Oregon had been forced to pay through the medium of rates a return to this company upon said property. The facts were conclusive, and the State department ordered the property eliminated from the rate base of the Washington system, but this order was not made retroactive and the hundreds of thousands of dollars previously paid as a return upon this property is gone forever.

But, continuing the story, this private power company was not satisfied with what was right; when denied of this added opportunity to gouge the public, it rebelled; the regulation that it had always boasted of met with little favor when it departed from its accustomed influence, so it sought through a subterfuge to gain an unfair advantage of the people it served by appealing to the courts upon the grounds of a technicality of law. It claimed that the regulatory body of this State lacked authority to correct an error that had been made years before when the previous rate base had been established for this company, at which time the error, or whatever it may be called, in allowing the Oregon properties to be a part of the Washington rate base was made. Imagine laws in this State that will permit an opinion to be handed down by our courts to the effect that the regulatory body of the State has no power to correct its own errors, defeating the very purpose for which this body was created and rendering it a regulatory body in name only, shorn of its powers to regulate, thereby rendering it powerless.

The next step in this case was to the Supreme Court, where it now rests awaiting a decision. Let us speculate results: If the Supreme Court reverses the lower court and upholds the regulatory body in its power to regulate, it is logical to assume that the private power company will appeal to the Federal courts, and if it wins there, then the State regulatory body is done, for unlike the private company it has no premise upon which it or the people can carry an issue of this nature to the Supreme Court of the United States.

STATE REGULATION HANDICAPPED

To further emphasize the handicap imposed upon State regulation, the courts of this State rendered an opinion to the effect that the sale of electric power to industries was not "public use"; therefore the regulatory body had no jurisdiction over its sale or its service. (Decision just rendered in the case of the Chelan Electric Power Co. may alter this opinion.) This accounts for the language found in the power tariffs filed by the private companies which reads, "The filing of this schedule for power not devoted to public use is voluntary on the part of the company." Operating under such conditions as this, it is little wonder that faith is ofttimes shattered in the State agencies, even though these agencies may be exerting every effort to earnestly and equitably serve the people.

If there is to be State regulation, then give to that regulatory body full and unlimited powers to regulate. If there are laws upon the statute books preventing such repeal them, and if new laws are required enact them, but in any event equip this body with ample authority and jurisdiction so that it may function in the manner intended, for under such pitiful circumstances as now exist there is little wonder that the private power companies have been able to prescribe such extortionate rates as those found in many sections of this State, and it is clearly evinced why its army of paid politicians has become all but a part of the fixtures in the lobby halls of our State legislature.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to submit another table furnished me by Mr. Harlan. This shows Tacoma's power rates, and it is divided among the different industries utilizing the power.

Thus, for instance, in the cotton textiles of Tacoma there are furnished 1,317.50 horsepower, at 0.415 of a cent per kilowatt-hour—less than half a cent per kilowatt-hour.

In the foundries there is 1,987.24 horsepower used, and they pay 0.47 of a cent per kilowatt-hour.

The shipbuilding industry pays 0.57 of a cent per kilowatt-hour.

The paper-manufacturing business pays 0.41 of a cent per kilowatt-hour.

The pump-manufacturing industry pays 0.665 of a cent.

And so on down the list.

The pulp and paper manufacturing industry takes 20,000 horsepower from them at a rate of 0.398 of a cent, practically four-tenths of a cent, per kilowatt-hour.

I ask that this schedule be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it can be readily understood why these cities are forging ahead. They are attracting industries there by reason of the advantageous rates for power that are supplied by these municipal plants.

Mr. President, this does not stand alone. The city of Los Angeles makes a similar showing. The city of Cleveland makes a similar showing. All of these facts it was our purpose, if this resolution should be adopted and the investigation go forward, to bring to the attention of the committee called upon to investigate the matter. Why should I present these matters to the Interstate Commerce Committee, simply called upon, not to determine the merits of this thing, but whether or not the investigation should go on?

I referred to a clipping that came in my mail only this morning about another of these transactions, in which securities were put out vastly in excess of the confessed value of the property.

Mr. President, I was also prepared to show before this committee that in a great western city, the electric light and power plant being owned by a private corporation and a desire being manifested by companies to buy the plant, that corporation caused an appraisal of the property to be made, in order that it might have a basis for making a proposition to sell the property.

It called to its aid eminent engineers to make the appraisal for it, and the information I have was given to me by one of the appraisers who made the appraisement. They were conscious of the fact that the company was desirous of selling the property, or at least that it had in contemplation the sale of the property, and they were accordingly desirous of going as far as they possibly could to give the thing the highest value that their judgment would permit. They figured it at $4,000,000, and it was sold at that figure. Within six months the company getting it put out securities to the total amount of $11,000,000 upon the same property.

I read now from a paper published at Muncie, Ind., and probably would be of interest to the senior Senator from that State were he in the Chamber:

ELWOOD, IND., February 12.—City officials have secured some valuable information which will be used in the controversy in which the city is engaged with the Elwood Water Co. in regard to a petition filed by the company with the public service commission for an increase in rates. City Attorney H. F. Wilkie has received information from attorneys and former owners of the local plant that the present owners purchased the plant for $100,000. This amount in bonds was paid by the present owners, and the bonds are still outstanding and in the hands of residents of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., where the former owners reside.

The present owners, in asking for the rate increase, in their petition placed the value of the plant at $640,000. When the hearing was held on January 25 they refused to answer questions in regard to the purchase price. The hearing was not completed here in January, but will be resumed late this month in Indianapolis. The information in regard to the purchase price then will be introduced by the city officials. They paid $100,000 for the plant, and are asking rates of the consumers of water in that city based upon a valuation of over $600,000.

It is a few of these things, Mr. President, that we would like to look into. We would like to find out whether the public are being charged excessive rates to pay dividends upon this watered stock, or whether the rates are down where they ought to be, and there is absolutely nothing to be expected in the way of return from these stocks on the part of those who have been induced to buy them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Are these some of the bonds concerning which it was stated a day or two ago that there had been no default in the payment of interest?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am unable to say that.

Mr. BARKLEY. The statement was made that none of the bonds of these public utilities outstanding had defaulted in the payment of interest.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So I am told.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was wondering whether that statement included these bonds that are based upon the transactions to which the Senator has reference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am unable to advise the Senator. I am going to call the attention of the Senate to another interesting transaction. I said in the address which I delivered here a year ago that there had been a feverish competition between these great holding companies for the acquisition of operating properties in the different States, they paying outrageous prices for them.

I call attention to an article which appeared on the 4th day of last August in the Manufacturers Record, a magazine published over in the city of Baltimore. I read as follows:

Recently an effort was made by the Electric Public Utilities Co., a Delaware corporation, to buy four electric companies in Maryland, as follows: The Lonaconing Electric Light Co., the Emmitsburg Electric Co., the Antietam Electric Light & Power Co., and the Midland Electric Light Co. These plants are located in small towns throughout the State.

The Lonaconing company has 550 shares of stock with a par value of $13,875, the Emmitsburg company 1,500 shares with a par value of $15,000, the Antietam company 115 shares with a par value of $11,500, and the Midland company 500 shares with a par value of $5,000, making a total for the four companies of $45,375. The price offered for these plants was $468,000 cash, plus a bonded indebtedness of $50,000, making a total of $518,000.

The Maryland commission—all honor to them—said, "You can not do business in this State on that basis. We will not tolerate the business at all." But that is not peculiar; it is not extraordinary at all. The thing has been going on all over the United States, the most exorbitant prices being paid for these companies. This article continues:

The engineers of the public-service commission made a report giving a replacement value on these four properties of something over $200,000, and a firm of engineers made a replacement value of something over $300,000. The price agreed upon between the buyer and seller was $518,000, and the annual profit on that price, as indicated by the earnings for the last three years, would be about 9 per cent.

The application was denied. The article continues:

Discussing this situation with an engineer who has recently come across several transactions of this kind, he made the statement that a friend of his had netted about $500,000 profit recently by buying up small utility companies in the South, spending a few thousand dollars on improvements, and then selling them at high figures to big electric combinations. He stated that as public-service commissions give to these companies the right to charge a rate which yields a profit of 7 to 8 per cent on the total valuation, many of them were perfectly willing to pay a big price to the intermediary, because capitalized or valued at these high prices they were still allowed to make 7 or 8 per cent by public-service commissions.

Mr. President, I have been accused by the Senator from Georgia of having been intemperate in my views, and perhaps in my language, in the discussion of this subject. I think it might be retorted that no great degree of judicial impartiality was exhibited by the Senator himself, in charging, for instance, that we had accused the Federal Trade Commission of being corrupt, and that we were engaged in a plot to destroy a great industry. But when I think of the mass of stuff that has come to me during the last six months, of the nature of which you can get some intimation by these examples which I have produced before you, I feel like saying, in the classic language of Lord Clive, I am surprised at my own moderation.

I do not care to comment upon the ill-tempered, not to say ill-mannered, remarks of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] on yesterday, addressed to me. I pass them by as the idle wind which I regard not. I have only a word to say with reference to his vitriolic and unrestrained criticism of my conduct of the inquiry into the leasing of the naval oil reserves. I desire to say with reference to that, only this, that on a former occasion the Senator from Maryland, having put out a statement of the same character, I challenged it upon the floor of the Senate, and he declared that he had no purpose whatever to embrace me in the general denunciation which he had directed against senatorial investigations, although his language was incapable of any other construction. Yet on yesterday his remarks were pitched in another key.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say about this matter. I have done my duty as I see it, with one purpose, and one purpose only, regardless of criticisms that may be aimed at me, to serve the people of the country in the obligation that I saw before me.

EXHIBIT 1

(Memorandum for Senator WALSH re injunction suits, etc., against the Federal Trade Commission)

(A) PROCEEDINGS IN WHICH ECONOMIC INVESTIGATIONS OF THE COMMISSION WERE HALTED BY INJUNCTIONS)

(1) THE CLAIRE FURNACE CO. CASE

In 1919 the press, the public, and various branches of State and National Governments were giving great attention to the enormous increase in the cost of the great majority of the necessities of life. In August of that year the Federal Trade Commission was asked by Congress what it could do touching the then high cost of living; and in response to the inquiry members of the commission appeared before the Commttee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives and suggested that a thorough inquiry into and publication of the facts respecting production, prices, and costs of certain basic commodities would, in their opinion, be of the greatest value to the country at large, to Congress, to the courts, to the prosecuting arm of the Government, and to business itself in ascertaining causes of the conditions existing. Asked what articles or industry should be investigated, the then chairman of the commission suggested fuel, steel, and several other basic commodities. As a result of this suggestion money was appropriated, and the commission sent questionnaires to practically all corporations engaged in the manufacture and sale in interstate commerce of steel products, requesting monthly reports showing the quantities of products manufactured, plant capacity, orders booked during the month, cost of manufacturing, prices at which sold in domestic and foreign commerce, and general income statements and balance sheets. The declared purpose of the inquiry was to publish the information acquired in totals, without divulging the identity of the concerns furnishing the data, for the purpose of showing existing conditions in the production and sale of steel products. The Claire Furnace Co. and certain other corporations declined to make the reports, and joined in a suit in equity to restrain the commission from proceeding in any manner to compel the production of the information or to impose any penalties for failure to produce it.

The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in which the suit was instituted, issued a permanent injunction on the ground that the information sought by the commission was not information respecting interstate commerce, nor information with respect to matters so directly affecting such commerce that it could be required under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

The commission took the case to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, which affirmed the decree of the lower court, Chief Justice Smyth dissenting.

The commission then appealed the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, the case being docketed in that court on March 21, 1923. A motion to advance the case was filed by the commission and granted, and the case was argued December 6, 1923. The commission's assignment of errors, among others, raised the following interesting questions:

(1) Has Congress the power to compel corporations to supply information within the field over which it has power to legislate, in order to learn whether remedial laws are required for the national welfare; (2) as a means of procuring information which Congress may itself require, may it constitutionally confer upon an administrative body authority to compel corporations to supply information, by resort to the courts, if necessary, respecting a subject over which it has jurisdiction; (a) for transmission to Congress; and (b) as a basis of reports to Congress and of recommendations to Congress for legislation by such administrative body.

On April 20, 1925, the Supreme Court directed reargument, which was had on November 24, 1925, and on April 18, 1927, this court rendered its decision dismissing the bill for want of equity.

The commission had not raised the question of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia sitting as a court of equity to entertain the suit. However, the trade commission act provides that upon application of the Attorney General, at the request of the commission, the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person or corporation to comply with the provisions of the act or any order made in pursuance thereof; and also provides that upon failure of any corporation to file any annual or special report it shall be liable to a penalty of $100 per day for such failure, to be recovered in a civil suit. After citing these provisions, the Supreme Court held that in event of either such proceeding the parties would have an adequate opportunity to present every objection which they could urge in the suit in equity, saying in part:

"There was nothing which the commission could have done to secure enforcement of the challenged orders except to request the Attorney General to institute proceedings for a mandamus, or supply him with the necessary facts for an action to enforce the incurred forfeitures, if, exercising his discretion, he had issued either proceeding, the defendant therein would have been fully heard and could have adequately and effectively presented every ground of objection sought to be presented now, consequently, the trial court should have refused to entertain the bill in equity for an injunction."

As further reason why the statutory procedure should be followed, the court stated that Congress intended to impose upon the Attorney General the duty of examining the scope and propriety of the orders, and of sifting out of the mass of inquiries issued what, in his judgment, was pertinent and lawful, before asking the court to adjudge forfeitures for failure to give the correct amount of information required or to issue a mandamus against those whom the orders affected and who refused to comply. The exercise of this discretion will greatly relieve the court and may save it much unnecessary labor and discussion.

This seems to make the orders and request for information of the commission subject to the approval of the Attorney General, though the reports of committees and debates on the Federal Trade Commission act indicate that it was the purpose of Congress to create a commission which would be entirely independent of the governmental departments.

The commission, as previously stated, had not raised in either of the courts below the question of the jurisdiction of the trial court, but had submitted to the jurisdiction with the hope that a decision might be had in a measure at least determining the character of the information which the commission is authorized by the statute to secure from corporations under the authority to require annual and special reports. So much was the commission desirous of learning the proper construction of the statute in this regard that it had, upon refusal of the steel companies to file the reports, applied to the Attorney General for the institution of suits in mandamus to compel compliance with the commission's order, and the Attorney General had in fact instituted two suits in the proper district courts of the United States, one against the Republic Iron & Steel Co., and the other against the Bethlehem Steel Co. The prosecution of these suits was stayed by the injunction issued by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and, since the decision of the case by the Supreme Court had been dismissed, the appropriation under which the investigation was being prosecuted having long since lapsed.

THE MAYNARD COAL CO. CASE

At about the same time that the steel companies were asked by the commission to file monthly reports (referred to above under "The Claire Furnace Co. case"), substantially similar questionnaires were sent to practically all corporations engaged in the production and sale in interstate commerce of bituminous coal.

One of these companies, the Maynard Coal Co., declined to make the report in question, and applied to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for an injunction. A permanent injunction practically identical with that issued in the Claire Furnace Co. case was awarded.

The case was taken by the commission to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, where argument was had on January 9 and 10, 1924. On May 10, 1924, the Court of Appeals directed a reargument. The case was reached on the calendar October 10 of that year and continued generally at that time pending a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Claire Furnace Co. case.

The case was reargued on October 3, 1927, and on November 7 the Court of Appeals rendered its opinion, reversing the decree of the lower court, and remanding the cause, with directions to dismiss the bill. The court followed the action of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Claire Furnace Co. case, quoting from the opinion in that case as follows:

"With this statement we are forced to the consideration of a controlling question of jurisdiction. In the case of Federal Trade Commission et al. v. Claire Furnace Co. et al. (274 U. S. 160) the Supreme Court considered a proceeding identical with that presented in this case where an injunction had been granted to restrain the threatened enforcement of the penalty for refusal to comply with a similar order of the commission. The court there held that injunction did not lie since the statute furnished complainants a complete and adequate remedy at law."

* * * * * * *

"Considering the discretionary power reposed in the Attorney General to control the bringing of actions under the act, the court in its opinion in the Claire case said: 'There was nothing which the commission could have done to secure enforcement of the challenged orders except to request the Attorney General to institute proceedings for a mandamus or supply him with the necessary facts for an action to enforce the incurred forfeitures. If, exercising his direction, he had instituted either proceeding the defendant therein would have been fully heard and could have adequately and effectively presented every ground of objection sought to be presented now. Consequently the trial court should have refused to entertain the bill in equity for an injunction. * * * It was intended by Congress in providing this method of enforcing the orders of the Trade Commission to impose upon the Attorney General the duty of examining the scope and propriety of the orders, and of sifting out of the mass of inquiries issued what in his judgment was pertinent and lawful before asking the court to adjudge forfeitures for failure to give the great amount of information required or to issue a mandamus against those whom the orders affected and who refused to comply. The wide scope and variety of the questions, answers to which are asked in these orders, show the wisdom of requiring the chief law officer of the Government to exercise a sound discretion in designating the inquiries to enforce which he shall feel justified in invoking the action of the court. In a case like this the exercise of this discretion will greatly relieve the court and may save it much unnecessary labor and discussion. The purpose of Congress in this requirement is plain, and we do not think that the court below should have dispensed with such assistance. Until the Attorney General acts, the defendants can not suffer; and when he does act, they can promptly answer and have full opportunity to contest the legality of any prejudicial proceeding against them. That right being adequate, they were not in a position to ask relief by injunction. The bill should have been dismissed for want of equity.'"

Final decree, in accordance with the mandate of the court of appeals, was entered by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia on December 14, 1927.

THE MILLERS' NATIONAL FEDERATION CASE

On February 16, 1924, the United States Senate, by resolution, directed the commission to investigate and report to the Senate, among other things, the extent and methods of price fixing, price maintenance, and price discrimination in the flour and bread industries, developments in the direction of monopoly and concentration of control, and all evidence indicating the existence of agreements, conspiracies, or combinations in these industries. In the course of the investigation the commission made inquiry with respect to the activities of the Millers' National Federation, a voluntary, unincorporated association whose members produce approximately 65 per cent of the flour milled in the United States, as well as of the activities of other milling associations and corporations engaged in the milling industry. Permission was requested of the Millers' National Federation to inspect certain papers, documents, and correspondence files, which permission was in part granted. As a result of the inspection of certain correspondence, the commission requested the federation to supply it with copies of certain designated letters, and further requested access, for the purpose of inspection, to minutes of meetings among members of the federation and other millers in various parts of the country, and to letters passing between the federation and its members leading up to the adoption of a so-called code of ethics by the federation. The request was denied. The commission thereafter called a hearing in the investigation at Chicago, Ill., and served subpœna upon the secretary of the federation requiring him to produce at the hearing certain letters specified by dates, names of the parties correspondent, and subject matter, which its representative had been permitted to inspect in the federation's offices. Subpœnas were also served requiring the production of minutes of the meetings among members of the federation and other millers above mentioned (inspection of which had been denied), and of the letters relating to the adoption of the code of ethics. The Washburn-Crosby Co., a member of the federation and the largest milling corporation in the United States, having also refused to permit the commission to inspect certain letters specified by dates, names of parties correspondent, and subject matter, as well as having declined to permit a statement of its business, made up from its books by representatives of the commission to be taken from its offices, subpœnas duces tecum were served upon officers of the corporation requiring the production of the letters and of the statement, at a hearing to be held at Minneapolis, Minn.

On the day prior to the hearing set for Chicago, Ill., the Millers' National Federation, on behalf of its members, filed a petition in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia praying for a temporary restraining order and a temporary injunction restraining the commission from taking any steps or instituting any proceedings to enforce the subpœnas or requiring the plaintiffs, or any of them, to produce the documents or letters required thereby. On the day of hearing set at Chicago the secretary of the federation, the officers of the Washburn-Crosby Co., and certain idividuals connected with the federation through membership therein of corporations in which they were officers, did not appear as required by subpœnas, and on the morning of the same day a temporary restraining order was issued by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia as prayed for in the petition. A motion for temporary injunction was subsequently made. The commission answered the motion on the merits and moved to dismiss the petition on various grounds, among others, that the court was without jurisdiction to restrain the commission from proceeding with the hearing. Both motions were argued, and on September 22, 1926, the court rendered its decision enjoining the commission. From this an appeal was allowed on December 10, 1926, to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. Before hearing of this appeal was had the commission on March 30, 1927, petitioned the Supreme Court of the United States under section 240(a) of the Judicial Code for certiorari, which was denied on April 25, 1927, thus allowing the case to remain on appeal in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

The case was argued in the court of appeals on October 3–4, 1927, and on December 5, 1927, that court affirmed the decree of the Supreme Court of the District (enjoining the commission), and remanded the case for further proceedings. The court held that the opinion of Supreme Court of the United States in the Claire Furnace Co. case was not controlling; that the present case must be determined upon principles not obtaining in that case; and that injunction would lie to restrain the commission should the court find on a final determination of the case on its merits that the commission had exceeded its jurisdiction. In short, its holding simply was that the Supreme Court of the District had jurisdiction to determine the matter. The commission, on December 12, filed a petition for rehearing, on the ground that the court had failed to decide the point of law which was the principal basis for the judgment below, and practically the sole ground assigned in the petition for special appeal on which the case was heard in the court of appeals. The petition for rehearing was denied on January 21, 1928; the case now awaits determination on the merits on the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

(B) PROCEEDINGS IN WHICH THE COMMISSION SOUGHT BY MANDAMUS TO SECURE INFORMATION NECESSARY FOR ECONOMIC INVESTIGATIONS

THE AMERICAN TOBACCO AND LORILLARD CO. CASES

On August 9, 1921, the United States Senate passed a resolution directing the Federal Trade Commission:

"To investigate the tobacco situation in the United States as to the domestic and export trade, with particular reference as to market price to producers for tobacco and the market price for manufactured tobacco and the price of leaf tobacco exported, and report to the Senate as soon as possible the result of such investigation."

In September of the same year there were filed with the commission complaints charging that the American Tobacco and Lorillard companies were violating section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission act, in that they were parties to a combination to fix and regulate the resale prices at which commodities manufactured and sold by them should be resold in interstate commerce by those to whom they had disposed of their products. The commission, in accordance with its usual practice of making preliminary inquiries before issuing formal complaints, and for the purpose of informing the Senate, as directed in the resolution mentioned above, instituted an investigation into the organization, business, conduct, practices, and management of the two companies and into the alleged violation of section 5 of the trade commission act. Certain information was compiled relating to the interstate business of the companies, they permitting the inspection by the commission of certain books and documents. They, however, refused to permit the inspection of certain other documents and correspondence files, whereupon the commission, through its duly authorized agent, served a formal notice and demand for access to certain records, documents, and correspondence, described as follows:

"All letters and telegrams received by the American Tobacco Co. from all of its jobber customers located at different points throughout the United States, and also copies of all letters and telegrams sent by the American Tobacco Co. to such jobbers during the period of January 1, 1921, to December 31, 1921, inclusive."

In January, 1922, the commission made a preliminary report to Congress setting forth the facts it had developed in response to the resolution above referred to.

On June 13, 1922, the Attorney General of the United States, acting at the request and on behalf of the commission, filed in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York separate petitions against the American and Lorillard companies, praying that alternative writs of mandamus issue commanding the companies, unless the letters and telegrams passing between the companies and their jobber customers be submitted to the agents of the commission for inspection and examination, to show cause why peremptory writs of mandamus should not issue commanding them to do so. The commission alleged in its petitions that the refusal of the companies to permit the access demanded had prevented it from making a complete report in response to the Senate resolution and hindered the commission from investigating the conduct, management, etc., of the companies and from performing its duty to prevent the use of unfair methods of competition in interstate commerce. The district court denied the petitions, saying in the course of its opinion (October 3, 1922):

"To grant the relief prayed for by the petitioner would be to permit of an unreasonable search and seizure of papers in violation of the fourth amendment. It was not the intention of Congress to grant such unlimited examination and inspection by the legislature in question, nor, indeed, did Congress have authority to do so under the commerce clause of the Constitution. It would be unreasonable and unjust to accede to the demands of the petitioner; and the application for the peremptory writ of mandamus against the respondents, American Tobacco Co. and P. Lorillard Co. is denied."

Writs of error were sued out by the commission directly to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Supreme Court, in affirming the judgment of the lower tribunal, said:

"The right of access given by the statute is to documentary evidence—not to all documents, but to such documents as are evidence. The analogies of the law do not allow the party wanting evidence to call for all documents in order to see if they do not contain it. Some ground must be shown for supposing that the documents called for do contain it."

What the Supreme Court decided was whether the commission had an unlimited right of access to and inspection of corporate records. The commission did not claim such a right and was not attempting to exercise it. The real question before the court was whether a writ of mandamus should issue to enforce compliance with a limited demand for production and inspection of documents in a proceeding against a corporation which was being conducted under separate statutory powers, viz: (a) Under a Senate resolution which did not include specific charges of violation of law; (b) under information filed with the commission giving the commission reason to believe that the law had been violated and that a proceeding by it would be to the public interest; and, (c) under a formal complaint which included formal charges of violation of law.

THE GRAIN CASES

The second group of this class of cases arose out of an investigation by the commission pursuant to a Senate resolution (S. Res. 133, 67th Cong. 2d sess.) directing the commission to investigate the grain business, with particular reference to export business, with a view to ascertaining the causes of the decline in domestic prices of grain, whether the decline in export prices was due to conditions in the export market, and the reason for the spread of from 15 to 20 cents between the prices of cash wheat and of futures.

In connection with this investigation the commission, after informal requests had been denied, made formal demand for access to the books and records of three companies engaged in the export grain business in Baltimore, Md. The demand was refused and a petition for mandamus to compel the inspection was filed. The court denied the petition for the writ, holding (a) that the Senate resolution did not direct the commission to inquire respecting any alleged violation of the antitrust act, and therefore did not confer any authority upon the commission under section 6 (d) of the trade commission act; (b) that section 6 (a) and (b) of the trade commission act do not confer any authority to inspect the books and documents of corporations generally where there is no alleged violation of law, but where a general investigation only is being made into conditions existing in the industry; (c) that any attempts by the courts to confer the authority to make such inspection in a general inquiry would be unconstitutional. (Federal Trade Commission v. Baltimore Grain Co.; Federal Trade Commission v. H. C. Jones Co.; Federal Trade Commission v. Hammond, Snyder & Co., 284 Fed. 886.)

The commission regarded the principle involved in this group of cases too important not to be passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, and it therefore prosecuted an appeal to that tribunal. Briefs were prepared and filed, the case argued, and on March 16, 1925, a per curiam decision was rendered affirming the decision in the lower court on the authority of the tobacco cases (supra).

THE BASIC PRODUCTS CO. CASE

(260 Fed. 472)

This case was before the court on the demurrer of the Government to the answer of the Basic Products Co. to a petition filed by the Attorney General of the United States at the request of the Federal Trade Commission for a writ of mandamus upon the company.

The Basic Products Co. is the manufacturer of Syndolag, a patented article which it is claimed has been developed by the defendant after great expenditure of time and money, and in the production of which certain refinements of method have been developed which are and have been kept secret and which constitute trade secrets of great value, as are also the cost accounts relating to its production. Syndolag, among its other uses, is widely sold by the defendant for repairing the bottoms of open-hearth steel furnaces. The United States Navy Department during the war ordered 250 tons of Syndolag, for which the defendant quoted $35 per ton, but which price the Navy Department refused to agree to and required that the material be billed at $30 per ton. A certain amount was shipped and billed at such tentative price. On the signing of the armistice the balance of the order was canceled. Eventually payment was made to the defendant for all Syndolag delivered, at the $30 rate. The company has repeatedly offered to bill the material at whatever price the Navy Department should fix and make refund of any excess received; further, it offered to refund to the Navy Department, if the department was unwilling or unable to fix a price, the whole amount received in connection with the transaction. In the meantime, repeated demands have been made by the Navy Department on defendant for affidavits showing cost of production of the article for the averred reason of enabling the Navy Department to decide upon the price which it would be willing to pay defendant for its production. The defendant refused to furnish such affidavits, whereupon the department's demands were taken up by the Federal Trade Commission at the request of the department. On March 8, 1919, the commission passed a resolution to the effect that pursuant to the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 6 of the Federal Trade Commission act, the commission proceed to gather and compile information concerning, and investigate the organization, business, conduct, practices, and management of the Basic Products Co. The company has refused to allow its books to be examined for the purposes set forth in the resolution.

Judge Orr, in his opinion, first states, "With respect to the petition, it is to be noticed:

"That there is no averment of any facts which show that the defendant is engaged in interstate commerce. The recital in the resolution of the Federal Trade Commission, which is hereinafter set forth, is not such averment."

The court holds that in view of the definition of the word "commerce" by the act itself the only corporations whose organization, business, conduct, practices, and management may be investigated by it under the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 6 of the Federal Trade Commission act are those that are engaged in interstate commerce. Judge Orr says: "In the argument, as well as in the petition, there was lacking the assertion of facts, which would bring the defendant within the terms of the act of Congress. Nowhere has it been made to appear that the defendant is engaged in interstate commerce in any other way than any other corporation or any citizen may be so engaged, by making one or more shipments of manufactured goods from one State into another."

After quoting at some length from the opinion of Judge Jackson, in re Greene (52 Fed. 104–113), as containing not only a definition but an elaboration thereof, which suggests not only the limitations upon the power of Congress but also possibilities of the existence of activities by entities, corporate or otherwise, which might be brought within the jurisdiction conferred by the act upon the Federal Trade Commission, Judge Orr states:

"Imagination, however, can not suggest such an extension of constitutional limitation as may justify the investigation undertaken by the commission in this case. Indeed, so far as the matter has been brought to the attention of the court, no such assertion of power was ever made to the courts. Investigation under subdivision (a) of section 6 is limited to corporations engaged in interstate commerce. The defendant is engaged in manufacture."

In closing, Judge Orr, in his opinion, says:

"Counsel for the defendant urges upon this court the necessity of declaring section 6 of the trade commission act to be unconstitutional, not only 'in so far as it authorizes investigations and compulsory disclosures of matters which are beyond the commerce power of Congress,' but also 'in so far as it attempts to authorize a search or seizure by an administrative agency of the Government without charge or suspicion of wrongdoing.' While the contention of counsel is probably sound, this court does not deem it necessary to go farther than to hold that the commission have not the power to carry on investigation which they have assumed in the present case.

* * * * * * * *

"An incident of such investigation is the ascertainment of trade secrets. It is plain that the cost of manufacturing a patented product to which the manufacturer has the exclusive right may be a trade secret, a species of property of great value. This is also true of refinements of method in producing the same. The act prohibits the disclosure of trade secrets. The assumption that no such disclosure will be made disappears before the expressed intention to give the information to the Navy Department. We have, then, a contemplated search and seizure and a contemplated taking of private property for public use without due process of law, which are violative of the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution.

"With respect to the third reason in support of the demurrer, little need be said. The act itself authorizes a petition for mandamus in aid of the commission. 'Mandamus issues where, and only when, there is a right to demand, and a corresponding duty to perform, the act required.' (19 Standard Encyclopedia of Procedure, 128.) It never was intended that the extent of a free man's duty to perform should be determined by those who demand performance.

"The demurrer must be overruled and the petition for a writ of mandamus must be refused."

(C) PROCEEDINGS IN WHICH EFFORTS WERE MADE TO PREVENT THE COMMISSION FROM PROCEEDING UNDER SECTION 5 OF ITS ORGANIC ACT.

THE T. C. HURST & SON CASE

The commission in this case had issued its complaint, charging that respondents were engaged at Norfolk, Va., in the business of selling chandlery supplies to ships reaching the port of Norfolk, Va., while engaged in interstate and foreign commerce; that in the course of their business they had given cash commissions and gratuities to captains and other officers and employees in charge of ships reaching said port to induce them to purchase from respondents, to the exclusion of competitors of the respondents, provisions and supplies for use and consumption upon such ships in and beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the United States.

Hurst & Son, in their bill for injunction, averred that certain sections of the act of Congress creating the commission were unconstitution and void, for the following reasons: (a) Because beyond the powers vested in Congress by the Constitution; (b) because there is delegated to the commission legislative authority; (c) because the commission is empowered to define and determine what shall constitute "unfair methods of competition in commerce"; (d) because it deprives the parties of the right of trial by jury; (e) because the statute attempts to regulate intrastate as well as interstate commerce; (f) because the proceedings sought to be enjoined discriminate between persons engaged in the same line of business and take away the property of one without due process of law and without just compensation, while not molesting others using the same practice, and for other reasons more specifically set up in the bill of complaint.

The court held that the contention that the act was unconstitutional for any of the reasons specified was without merit, and further held that the commission had acted entirely within its rights of and concerning a matter liable to injuriously affect commerce, and declined to grant the injunction prayed for.

In the course of its opinion the court said:

"The constitutionality of the act itself is challenged, also the right of the commission to decide what shall constitute unfair competition, and of Congress to authorize it so to do, as well as the manner in which the commission may proceed in the discharge of its duties to determine what is unfair competition, the specific complaint being that the commission may not proceed against a particular person, firm, or corporation, believed to be engaged in unfair competition, but must in the same proceeding include all other persons similarly engaged."

After quoting the provisions of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission act, the court then disposed of the various contentions made by the complainants, as follows:

"The contention that the act of Congress is unconstitutional for any of the reasons specified, is without merit, as it is manifestly within the power of Congress to legislate generally in respect to the burdens that may or may not be imposed upon foreign and interstate commerce, and it is also within its power to declare what would be fair and what unfair methods and dealings in relation thereto, and how the same should be ascertained and determined. The commission is given full power and authority to investigate, make findings of fact, and render its judgment and order in relation thereto, and before the same is carried into effect, the judgment of the circuit court of appeals, the second highest court under the Government, is to be sought by the commission to enforce its order, and any party required by such order to cease and desist from using such method of competition, may obtain a review of such order in the circuit court of appeals, by filing its written petition praying therefor. The action of the circuit court of appeals is final, save when its interposition is sought by the commission, certiorari lies from its decision to the Supreme Court of the United States. The jurisdiction of the circuit court of appeals to enforce, set aside, or modify orders of the commission is exclusive. In all of the proceedings, whether before the commission or the court, the amplest provision is made for notice to and full hearing of all parties interested, and for this court, for any of the reasons urged, to anticipate by injunction, the action of the commission, and the judgment of the court, charged under the law with the review thereof, would be clearly an usurpation of authority."

THE BUTTERICK CO. CASE

Another suit was brought in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia by the Butterick Co., a corporation, and its affiliated corporations, against which a complaint had been issued by the commission, charging them with unfair methods of competition (resale price maintenance), in violation of section 5 of the commission act, and with violations of section 3 of the Clayton Act (tying contracts). In these suits the principal ground for injunction relied upon was that the commission was without jurisdiction, because its complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a violation of section 5 of the commission act or of section 3 of the Clayton Act. Thus was raised for determination the important question of the right of parties proceeded against by the commission to prevent such proceedings by recourse to a court of equity. On the argument counsel for the commission contended, in opposition to the application for injunction, that no ground whatever was shown for the interposition of a court of equity, and that the provisions of the Federal Trade Commission act and the Clayton Act provided a method of review of the commission's orders by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, which afforded the respondents an adequate remedy under these statutes, which remedy was by the very terms of the statute made exclusive. The court refused to grant the injunction and dismissed the bills.

THE DOUGLAS FIR CO. CASE

This represented an attempt by the Douglas Fir Exploitation & Export Co. et al. to prevent the commission, by injunction, from issuing a complaint charging unfair methods of competition in violation of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission act, also section 4 of the export trade act. The action was commenced February 17, 1922.

The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in which the company instituted action, without opinion, granted the commission's motion to dismiss on the ground that the plaintiff had not stated such a case as would entitle it, in a court of equity, to any relief from or against the commission.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF MINNEAPOLIS CASE

(280 Fed. 45—C. C. A., eighth circuit)

This was a petition in certiorari to review preliminary orders of the commission, denying the motions of the chamber of commerce and other respondents named in the complaint issued by the commission. The object of the motions was to dismiss the complaint upon jurisdictional grounds before hearing upon the merits; the complaint charged that respondent had made use of unfair methods of competition in violation of section 5 of the commission act. The petition for certiorari for want of jurisdiction in the court to entertain it was denied. The court in the course of its opinion stated:

"In cases arising under this law injunctions to halt the taking of testimony have been uniformly denied. The powers conferred upon this commission are similar to those conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the exception that the powers of the latter are more pronounced and potential. In all cases where Congress has lodged in administrative officers of boards power to find facts and make orders, such findings and orders are conclusive when supported by substantial legal evidence. The courts will not consider with nicety the weight of such evidence. Illustrations of this principle are to be found in many cases arising under the Land Department, the Post Office Department, and before the Interstate Commerce Commission. To halt this investigation before testimony is taken would be an invasion of the powers of the legislative and executive branches of the Government.

"The real gist of the complaint here is that it is claimed, and with plausibility, that the chief petitioner is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission; that the commission is proceeding erroneously and in excess of its powers; that the taking of the testimony before a final order can be made will be very expensive, and that a grievous burden is being inflicted upon petitioners, for which an ultimate setting aside of any order that may be made will not adequately compensate them. This is true in some degree of any order of the commission which may finally be set aside. The law does not contemplate that commissions of this nature will act arbitrarily nor without probable cause. It is, of course, conceivable that they may do so, but such a possibility can not justify this court in exceeding its statutory powers and authority. To do so would be to deny to the administrative and legislative branches of the Government the powers and authority which have been conferred upon them and which have been uniformly upheld by the courts. It may be desirable that the law should provide for a preliminary review of questions of jurisdiction either by the circuit court of appeals or by the district courts, but in the absence of such provision we can not assume that power."

DEPARTMENT OF WATER AND POWER, BUREAU OF POWER AND LIGHT OF THE CITY OF LOS ANGELES,
November 4, 1927.

Senator THOMAS J. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Thinking that it might prove of interest to you, I am sending you, separately, a copy of the audit report by Price, Waterhouse & Co. of the financial operations and status of the bureau of power and light of the department of water and power, city of Los Angeles, together with a copy of the ordinance approving rates established and charged by the municipal bureau of power and light for electric service furnished by it within the city to the city and its inhabitants.

The audit report shows the operating revenues and expenditures of the bureau for the fiscal year 1926–27, and the financial status of the bureau, assets versus liabilities, as of June 30, 1927.

The municipal bureau of power and light began operating—that is, rendering electric service within the city—in May, 1917, so that the summary financial report marked "Exhibit 1" shows the results of 10 years of operation, total assets in excess of $64,000,000, with actual liabilities less than the assets by more than $23,000,000.

The difference between the assets and actual liabilities is made up of $18,265,000 of surpluses or clear profits made during the 10-year period, approximately $4,737,000 contributed from tax money during the construction period and represented by capital investment, and $240,000 of bond premiums.

The yearly surpluses as set up by our accountants and audited by Price, Waterhouse & Co. have been arrived at by first deducting from gross operating revenue the total cost of operation and maintenance, full depreciation allowance, and all interest. For the last fiscal year the surplus was $3,258,000 out of a gross earning of $12,659,000. This is an excellent showing, we feel, in view of the especially low electric rates charged by the bureau for service. The rates charged by private electric companies elsewhere in California would result in a gross revenue to the bureau of power and light, if charged by it, from 15 per cent to 18 per cent greater than our actual gross revenues, while the rates charged in various cities of similar size in the United States by private corporations would result in a gross revenue to the bureau of power and light, if charged by it, from 15 per cent to 50 per cent greater than our actual gross revenue.

Very truly yours,

E. F. SCATTERGOOD,
Chief Electrical Engineer and General Manager.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], as modified.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when Mr. FLETCHER'S name was called). The senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. If the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "nay." If the Senator from Delaware were present and permitted to vote, I am advised that he would vote "yea."

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. NORRIS (when his name was called). Upon this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. If the junior Senator from Arkansas were present he would vote "yea." I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate, and vote "nay." I desire to announce, although it may be apparent from my transfer, that if the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] were present on this question he would vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS'S name was called). My colleague, the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], is unavoidably detained. He has a general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]. If present my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. If that Senator were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BROOKHART (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I have voted, but as my pair is absent I shall have to withdraw my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. On this question I am paired with that Senator. If he were present he would vote "yea," and if I were permitted to vote I would vote "nay." I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], and that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] is paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. If present, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] would vote "yea" and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] would vote "nay."

Mr. FRAZIER. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. If I were allowed to vote, I would vote "nay." If the Senator from North Carolina were present and voting, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 31, as follows:

So Mr. GEORGE'S amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, on page 3, line 3, I move to strike out the word "committee" and insert the word "commission."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 3, strike out the word "committee" and insert the word "commission."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I now move to strike out all after line 16, on page 3; that is to say, all that portion of the resolution which merely provides for hearings before the committee, the right of the committee to summon witnesses, and so forth, and fixing the pay for the reporting of the testimony. Manifestly that would have no application now, since the resolution goes to the Federal Trade Commission. I move to strike out all after line 16, on page 3, down to the end of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I now move that the resolution be amended by adding at the end thereof the following language, which I ask the clerk to report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add at the end of the resolution the following:

The commission is hereby further directed to report particularly whether any of the practices heretofore in this resolution stated tend to create a monopoly or constitute a violation of the Federal antitrust laws.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment at the end of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the paragraph just agreed to insert the following:

The Senate shall proceed, within 10 days after the passage of this resolution, to select an attorney to present and develop all facts before the commission connected with this investigation, and the attorney shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate an amount fixed by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I very much hope that the amendment will not be agreed to. I can not approve of the Senate of the United States employing lawyers to present a case of that character. The Federal Trade Commission are amply supplied with lawyers to look after matters imposed upon them and committed to their keeping. I see no necessity for the adoption of this particular amendment.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I think the only thing necessary to complete the work that has just been done would be to remove absolutely any possibility of a real investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, since the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has made the statement about the amendment I desire to state this fact: As I understand it, this is not a regular court proceeding. If there is not some method of presenting the evidence there will be no evidence before the commission. There must be some one charged with that duty; that is, if it is really intended to have an investigation. Of course, if no investigation is desired, the amendment should be overwhelmingly defeated.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, in view of the adoption of the main amendment presented by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], I for one am unwilling that the Senate shall have anything whatsoever to do with this so-called investigation, and I shall vote against the amendment presented by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I hope my colleague's amendment will be adopted. I think it would be a good thing to select some bright and trustworthy attorney to present such facts as he may be in possession of to the commission.

The Senate has employed attorneys to represent the Government in the cases of Sinclair and Doheney and Fall. What harm could come in this instance from having some competent attorney present any facts that he may find? No harm could come from that.

I for one, for reasons entirely satisfactory to me, voted in favor of the amendment to have the Federal Trade Commission conduct the investigation of the utility companies, but I should like to see some good lawyer given the opportunity to aid and assist in any way that he possibly could. If the commission should fail or refuse to do anything, the Senate will take the proper steps to see that an investigation is had. We are not tied up by this proceeding. We have not surrendered any right that we have. The Senator from Montana suggested that the companies might take an appeal from the Trade Commission on the ground that it had no authority and thus would hold up the matter in the courts. If any such proceeding is started looking to delay or to preventing an investigation, I shall move that the Senate itself shall proceed to the investigation after the two national conventions shall have met and adjourned.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, do I understand the amendment directs the Senate to employ the counsel and that he shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate?

Mr. BLACK. The amendment is designed to provide for the employment of an attorney.

Mr. SWANSON. It seems to me that if the commission is competent to make the investigation it certainly ought to be competent to select counsel. The Senate has decided that it is competent to make the investigation, and it does seem to me to be making a reflection on them to say that they have not sense enough to select such counsel as they may need.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inquire into and report to the Senate, by filing with the Secretary thereof, within each 30 days after the passage of this resolution and finally on the completion of the investigation (any such inquiry before the commission to be open to the public and due notice of the time and place of all hearings to be given by the commission, and the stenographic report of the evidence taken by the commission to accompany the partial and final reports) upon: (1) The growth of the capital assets and capital liabilities of public utility corporations doing an interstate or international business supplying either electrical energy in the form of power or light or both, however produced, or gas, natural or artificial, of corporations holding the stocks of two or more public-utility corporations operating in different States, and of nonpublic-utility corporations owned or controlled by such holding companies; (2) the method of issuing, the price realized or value received, the commissions or bonuses paid or received, and other pertinent facts with respect to the various security issues of all classes of corporations herein named, including the bonds and other evidences of indebtedness thereof, as well as the stocks of the same; (3) the extent to which such holding companies or their stockholders control or are financially interested in financial, engineering, construction, and/or management corporations, and the relation, one to the other, of the classes of corporations last named, the holding companies, and the public-utility corporations; (4) the services furnished to such public-utility corporations by such holding companies and/or their associated, affiliated, and/or subsidiary companies, the fees, commissions, bonuses, or other charges made therefor, and the earnings and expenses of such holding companies and their associated, affiliated, and/or subsidiary companies; and (5) the value or detriment to the public of such holding companies owning the stock or otherwise controlling such public-utility corporations immediately or remotely, with the extent of such ownership or control, and particularly what legislation, if any, should be enacted by Congress to correct any abuses that may exist in the organization or operation of such holding companies.

The commission is further empowered to inquire and report whether, and to what extent, such corporations or any of the officers thereof or any one in their behalf or in behalf of any organization of which any such corporation may be a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, have made any and what effort to influence or control public opinion on account of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electrical energy is generated and distributed, or since 1923 to influence or control elections: Provided, That the elections herein referred to shall be limited to the elections of President, Vice President, and Members of the United States Senate.

The commission is hereby further directed to report particularly whether any of the practices heretofore in this resolution stated tend to create a monopoly, or constitute violation of the Federal antitrust laws.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 9 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 16, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Hear us, O Lord of the vineyard. Thou dost still send us forth to the fields of service. As each has his own task, may he achieve Thy good pleasure by a thorough devotion to duty. Helpfulness enters into the fundamental conception of our living. The praise of life is that man exhales bounty and stimulus and encouragement as he journeys on. Keep us clear of any just accusation that we have done any evil thing. Permit us to work with Thee in the service of our country, in the growth of Christian idealism, and in bringing heaven and earth nearer together. Rebuke our ease, smite our selfishness, and lead us on toward that realm where all night is past and the day has dawned. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 9186. An act authorizing the Sistersville Ohio River Bridge Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near Sistersville, Tyler County, W. Va.; and

H. R. 9660. An act authorizing the city of Louisville, Ky., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near said city.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7009) entitled "An act to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes."

DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may file minority views on the bill H. R. 10078, a deportation bill from the Committee on Immigration, within five days.

Mr. TILSON. Let the Clerk report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10078) providing for the deportation of certain aliens, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to file minority views on the bill H. R. 10078 within five days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADDRESS OF HON. LORING M. BLACK, JR.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a speech delivered by my colleague [Mr. BLACK] on the retirement of Admiral Plunkett.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following speech of Hon. LORING M. BLACK, Jr., a Representative in Congress from the State of New York, at a dinner to Admiral Charles P. Plunkett, tendered by the civilian employees of the New York Navy Yard on February 13, 1928:

Mr. BLACK. Admiral Plunkett recently ventilated the subject of an Anglo-American war with a rather startling journalistic and official repercussion to himself. Such a conflict has long been whispered about in British and American naval and diplomatic circles. Our admiral succeeded in drawing it into the open and such open discussion should be healthy rather than hurtful.

On this question there are two main American theses: First, no American wants war with Great Britain; second, in the event of such a war, no American wants the United States to be unprepared.

There are some who believe that a conflict between the United States and the British Empire is unthinkable, but, as Mr. Storm Jameson said in the February English Review of 1921, "It is easy to declare roundly that a war between this country and America is unthinkable. That statement argues nothing so much as an imaginative incapacity on the part of the sentimentalists who make it." No less a student of international affairs than President Wilson has said that the seed of war in the modern world is industrial and commercial rivalry.

We have reached a stage of tremendous economic rivalry with Great Britian, and in 1926 we led Great Britain in the ratio of 91 to 85 in the relative value of foreign trade. Great Britain has long been accustomed to the position of the great economic and maritime leader of the world. In our coastwise trade alone we equal the entire foreign trade of Great Britain. Tradition has given to the leading economic factor the supremacy on the high seas. When we agree with Great Britain that there should be a parity of naval strength, we are making a great concession, for were we to have a Navy commensurate with our economic position as fixed by precedent, which precedent was made by Great Britain, we would have a Navy far surpassing the British.

The American idealists on the subject of the high-mindedness of foreign diplomacy have suffered some rude jolts. They are beginning to realize that peace treaties of foreign powers arise from desires toward increasing national prestige rather than being motivated by a hope of world peace. No better example of this has been offered than the fate of the Washington Disarmament Conference. We had among our delegates some very practical gentlemen who were carried away with the postwar idealism and who were, therefore, out-maneuvered in the Washington conference war game by that ghostly diplomatic cat, Lord Balfour. Of him, Mr. A. G. Gardner, editor of the London News, has said "You feel that he would give you the same smile in sending you to the scaffold as he would in passing you the salt." At his door can be laid much responsibility for the present war talk and practically all responsibility for the naval-armament race which is now being run. He was crafty enough to leave Great Britain free to regain its relative naval strength by consenting to the scrapping of our new battleship construction and Great Britain's inferior ships of that type, having in mind that Great Britain could and would build a powerful instrument of war in the 10,000-ton cruiser. Mr. Gardner also said of Balfour that his "domination of the Washington conference made a deep and lasting impression on America of British statesmenship at its highest point." His mastery over the conference was not for the purpose of stopping armament competition but merely to bring down the then supremacy of America. He left the door open, and he repeatedly has said so, for the construction of the 10,000-ton cruiser which Mr. Hector Bywater describes as "in fighting value they are but little inferior to the treaty type, which they might engage without undue risk. As regards protection they are probably superior."

Great Britain has attempted to blame Japan for violating the spirit of the Washington treaty but in Lord Balfour's mind in Washington was worked out the idea of the present race.

It has always been my contention and stated on the floor of Congress that when Great Britain started her cruiser program and Japan her cruiser and submarine program that our State Department should have protested on the theory that the spirit of the treaty was being violated. Had such a protest been lodged, an exchange of notes should have brought us back to the ratio and would have accomplished much more than the ill-fated Geneva Conference.

Admiral Plunkett is not to blame for war talk, but responsibility is squarely up to Lord Balfour, who used a peace movement as a war weapon.

Speaking of the Geneva conference, President Coolidge, in his message to Congress, said, "We were granted much cooperation by Japan, but we were unable to come to an agreement with Great Britain."

This is a much terser and fully as pregnant statement of a possibility of conflict with Great Britain than any of the speeches of our admiral. This was followed up by the President in his submission to Congress of the Navy building program sent to the House by the Secretary of the Navy.

It seems to me that Congress might well follow the department on this matter. The program is generally misunderstood. Congress can not appropriate for the Navy year by year unless there is legislation passed by Congress prior to the appropriations authorizing the expenditure of the money for certain purposes. The proposal of the department was for the time being only to have Congress authorize subsequent Congresses to appropriate the money needed to carry out a naval policy.

As far as cruisers are concerned, if the department policy is adopted, the British will reach the 400,000-ton quota which we submitted at Geneva five years in advance of us on the basis of their existing approved program. I say to those Americans who have such great faith in Great Britain, that they consider what the British Admiralty deem necessary for the protection of British trade and then see if they can not conclude that our Navy is justified in asking just as much protection at least for a greater trade—the trade of the United States.

The British Admiralty believes it requires 600,000 tons of cruiser construction. President Coolidge tells us "we have a foreign commerce and ocean lines of trade unsurpassed by any other country." If the British Admiralty is right about what Great Britain needs in cruisers for its trade, surely our Naval Department is entirely too modest in its request of Congress for cruiser protection for our trade. Of course, the American who worries about the safety of Great Britain will tell us that the British need cruisers to protect trade within far-flung possessions, but the British understand that this immense cruiser fleet is not for the purpose of convoy but for the purpose of blockading and starving into submission a hostile nation. This purpose would naturally interfere with our trade should we care to have commercial intercourse with the power at war with Great Britain.

To those who believe that a great fleet means war, let us say that war logically proceeds from a stronger against a weaker power and if we are impressed with American ideals of peace, we can feel sure that we will not, as a stronger power, wage war and quite logically, a weaker power is not liable to make war on us. A strong fleet is a mighty help toward peace; as Lord Nelson said, "There is no better a negotiator in the councils of Europe than a fleet of English battleships."

It might be well to consider what Japan is doing. The Japanese Advertiser on October 8 said that Japan will be equipped, under its reorganization of the navy, with the most powerful navy she has ever possessed. The naval strategists do not always agree with the pacifists that at the time of war talk there will be war, for, as Commander Matsunaga, of the Japanese naval ministry says, "the Japanese Navy makes it a point to begin action at a time when it is thought practically impossible." Our trade on the Pacific and insular relations require that we at least maintain the ratio of 5 to 3 with Japan, as established at the Washington conference. Mr. Hector Bywater tells us that with few modern cruisers now at its disposal the American Navy could do practically nothing to secure the safety of trade routes in war.

In the absence of swift cruisers to hold hostile raiders in check the American merchant marine would, in all likelihood, be swept from the sea. The prime obligation on Congress under the Constitution is to provide for the common defense; and indeed the prime purpose of the Constitution was to organize the States into a unit for defensive purposes and foreign intercourse. Congress should pay heed to those experts of the Navy, such as Admiral Plunkett, who has for years been building up the American Navy with an eye to the construction work of possible aggressors.

There are those who believe that the money spent on warships could be better spent in the agricultural fields and otherwise; but the mere building of naval crafts is a peace-time contribution to the general good in relieving unemployment conditions. We had about 2,000,000 less employed in 1927 than we had in 1923. This is a serious condition. We have the private shipyards of the country going out of business and navy yards stagnating. We have American trade carried in foreign bottoms.

America has become a great economic factor and should take a reckoning of its power on the sea and start to build. This would help our shippers, our great industrial yards, and American skilled labor.

Should war ever unfortunately come to this country, it is better that it should come when we are ready to protect American interests. Admiral Plunkett has done a tremendous service to peace and preparedness by his honest indication of realities on the high seas.

I hope the country, on his retirement, will not lose his tremendous energy, brilliant mind, and honest heart. I trust that America will decide to build itself up as a maritime power. If those concerned have any vision, they will look to our admiral as a great leader in such a movement.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE OF WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute on a matter of the committee meeting of the World War veterans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. On Tuesday next there will be a meeting of the subcommittee of the World War Veterans' Committee on insurance at 10 o'clock a. m., at which time we would like to have Members of the House who are interested present their views on the continuance of the World War veterans' insurance.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing an article on flood control.

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, how long is it?

Mr. QUIN. It is a pretty lengthy article.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I object.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

MIDDLE RIO GRANDE CONSERVANCY DISTRICT AND THE PUEBLO INDIANS

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, for a little time I want to bring to the attention of the House the bill (S. 700) which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to execute an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district, for irrigation, drainage, and flood control for certain Pueblo Indian lands in New Mexico.

The bill passed the Senate, came to the House, passed the House the other day by unanimous consent, certain amendments which I offered being accepted. It has gone to the Senate, and there has been referred back to the Indian Affairs Committee, and its progress halted.

This is a highly important bill, and the action that has been taken is the result of unfair lobbying and has in it possibilities of great loss for the Indians as well as for the people of New Mexico. The situation that has arisen carries with it also this important question, that is broader than this bill—whether through misrepresentation, falsehood, and threats Congress can be diverted from doing that which ought to be done, with the result that nothing is done, or possibly something done that ought not to be done.

UNDESIRABLE LOBBYING

One John Collier, executive secretary of the Indian Defense Association (Inc.), with whose work I have had a great deal of contact, is responsible for this delay and threatened defeat of the bill. And I say, measuring my words, from knowledge of his methods and his accomplishments, that he is an insincere, unworthy, unreliable, misrepresenting, destructive lobbyist. He goes about peddling misinformation and threats with equal facility and irresponsibility, never constructive, but always destructive.

As when defending Sacco and Vanzetti, so he is at all times sure his Government is wrong. He is creating and preserving for himself a job and wasting the fine enthusiasm and altruistic motives of many fine people who are, through misunderstanding, led into his organization and who might, with honest leadership, do a great constructive work.

About this bill he has said in a circular letter which attacks me but was not sent me by him but has been peddled by him where he thought most desirable:

> There are six Pueblo tribes involved in this bill. Three of these—namely, the tribes, Cochiti, San Domingo, San Felite—do not possess sufficient cultivated land to make a decent living. Under the bill with the Cramton amendment these three tribes will be strangulated.
> Virtually though not technically confiscating these newly reclaimed acres, debarring the Indians from expanding their agriculture on to these newly reclaimed acres, and gravely handicapping the Indians in any effort to lease these newly reclaimed acres.
> The Pueblo tribes having been used up to a certain point are simply ditched and are wound up in a paralyzing hopeless rope of unjust debt.

I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SHALL HALF A MILLION DOLLARS BE A GIFT?

Mr. CRAMTON. The difference of opinion arises as to whether the million and a half dollars which is proposed to be appropriated for the benefit of those Indians is all, at some vague and indefinite time in the future, to be reimbursed to the Treasury, or whether we shall advance a million and a half dollars without interest, waiting 40 or 50 years for its return, and then make them a present of one-third of it—a half million dollars.

He charges that an agreement with the conservancy district, with the Indian Bureau, or others has been violated. Even he, with his loose handling of the truth, dares not say that I was a party to any agreement to give the Pueblos a half million, or that my committee made any such promise, or that Congress was ever a party to any such agreement. Has the time come when lobbyists can extort an agreement from a municipal project and hold Congress bound by it? Or can even a bureau of the Government commit Congress to a gift of half a million dollars from the Treasury?

This project means much to the middle Rio Grande Valley of New Mexico, and is not possible without Government cooperation on behalf of the Indians. The pestiferous force of the pernicious lobbying activities of Collier are no doubt known in New Mexico, where he has been active. Naturally they would consent to any reimbursement terms for the Indian lands that the Government sees fit to impose. That is between the Indians and the Government and does not affect the district, so long as the Indian lands come in. And the gentlemen who have been promoting the project here in a most honorable, very able, and entirely commendable way are not responsible for the so-called Cramton amendments.

Neither is the Indian Bureau responsible. They have advised the gift.

I accept my share of responsibility, acting in sincere performance of my official duty. Bound by no promise or commitment to the contrary, actuated by no selfish interest, and quite familiar with the proposition through hearings and study and several visits to the locality involved, I have proposed amendments which have met with general favor in this House, and I was assured would be accepted at the other end of the Capitol.

What has been the showing to Congress? In the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee holding hearings on the second deficiency appropriation bill last year, on the initial appropriation for reconnaissance work, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] asked this question:

> If an appropriation were made, would the money come out of the tribal fund or out of the General Treasury?

To which the reply was made by Mr. Rodey, who was the representative of the conservancy district:

> It would be chargeable to the tribal funds.

There was nothing there about any gift of a half million dollars.

My own subcommittee on the Interior Department appropriation bill visited the section last October, and we held extensive hearings in December, to the extent of 50 pages of the hearings on the Interior appropriation bill, and those hearings developed this difference of opinion with the Indian Bureau as to the policy to be followed. All my associates on that subcommittee on the Interior Department appropriation bill—Messrs. MURPHY, FRENCH, TAYLOR, and HASTINGS—held the view that I held, that we would be doing sufficient if we advanced the money without interest for their benefit, and that it all should be returned. I went before the Committee on Indian Affairs and expressed those views, and several members of that committee have indorsed my view. When the amendment went through the House several members of that committee, including the chairman, Mr. LEAVITT, were on the floor, and all were thoroughly cognizant of what was being done. There was no objection made at that time.

THE BILL AS AMENDED BY THE HOUSE

I shall insert at this point, under the permission given me, a copy of the bill, and it will show the bill as it was passed by the Senate and as it came to the House. There is inclosed in black brackets those parts that were crossed out by my amendment, and in italics will appear the language that I inserted. The full scope of my amendments then appears:

[S. 700, Seventieth Congress, first session]

A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to execute an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district, providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands in the Rio Grande Valley, N. Mex., and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to enter into an agreement with the Middle Rio Grande conservancy district, a political subdivision of the State of New Mexico, providing for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood control for the Pueblo Indian lands situated within the exterior boundaries of the said Middle Rio Grande conservancy district, as provided for by plans prepared for this purpose in pursuance to an act of February 14, 1927 (44 Stat. L. 1098). The construction cost of such conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood-control work apportioned to the Indian lands as shall not exceed $1,593,311, and [that] said sum, or so much thereof as may be required to pay the Indians' share of the cost of the work herein provided for, shall be payable in not less than five installments without interest, which installments shall be paid annually as work progresses[, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $1,593,311, of which amount $100,000 is hereby made immediately available for the payment of the first installment]: Provided, That should at any time it appear to the said Secretary that construction work is not being carried out in accordance with plans approved by him, he shall withhold payment of any sums that may under the agreement be due the conservancy district until such work shall have been done in accordance with the said plans: Provided further, That in determining the share of the cost of the works to be apportioned to the Indian lands there shall be taken into consideration [any] only [allowances determined by the Secretary of the Interior as propery deductible, and] the [total] Indian acreage benefited which shall be definitely determined by said Secretary and such acreage include only lands feasibly susceptible of economic irrigation and cultivation, and materially benefited by this work and in no event shall the average per acre cost for the area of Indian lands benefited exceed $67.50: Provided further, That all present water rights now appurtenant to approximately 8,346 acres of irrigated Pueblo lands owned individually or as pueblos under the proposed plans of the district, and all water for the domestic purposes of the Indians and for their stock shall be prior and paramount to any rights of the district or any property holder therein, which priority so defined shall be recognized and protected in the agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the said Middle Rio Grande conservancy district, and the water rights for newly reclaimed lands shall be recognized as equal to those of like district lands and be protected from discrimination in the division and use of water, and such water rights, old as well as new, shall not be subject to loss by nonuse or abandonment thereof so long as title to said lands shall remain in the Indians individually or as pueblos or in the United States, and such irrigated area of approximately 8,346 acres shall not be [subjected directly or indirectly to the reimbursable features of this act, nor shall it be] subject by the district or otherwise to any pro rata share of future operation and maintenance or betterment work performed by the district. [Subject to the foregoing exception the remainder of the] The share of the cost paid the district on behalf of the Indian lands under the agreement herein authorized, including any sum paid to the district from the funds authorized to be appropriated by the act of February 14, 1927 (44 Stat. L. 1098), shall be reimbursed to the United States [in accordance with the benefits derived, but in no event to exceed the limitation of cost herein fixed,] under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That such reimbursement shall be made only from leases or proceeds from the newly reclaimed Pueblo lands [in not less than 40 annual payments], and there is hereby created against such newly reclaimed lands a first lien, which lien shall not be enforced during the period that the title to such lands remains in the pueblos or individual Indian ownership: Provided further, That said Secretary of the Interior, through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or his duly authorized agent, shall be recognized by said district in all matters pertaining to its operation in the same ratio that the Indian lands bear to the total area of lands within the district, and that the district books and records shall be available at all times for inspection by said representative.

WHAT THE BILL DOES

What does the bill do? I say that John Collier or anyone else takes upon himself a tremendously heavy responsibility when he endangers the final enactment into law of so important and desirable a measure as this. That is particularly so upon the part of anyone who presumes to speak for the interest of the Indians, because they are benefited above all others.

This proposed conservancy district stretches for 150 miles along the Rio Grande River, above and below Albuquerque. It is only 3 or 4 miles wide. The Rio Grande River through the years has built itself up with a deposit of silt, so that drainage is about impossible for those lands adjacent to the river, so that whether they are Indian lands or white lands there are many acres that used to be cultivated that can not now be cultivated, because they have become water-logged and sour and filled with alkali. Nature knows no difference between white lands and Indian lands.

It is the purpose of this bill to afford drainage, flood protection, and water for irrigation for this long and narrow stretch of land. It can only be done by united action of the whole area. It is the purpose to afford drainage and remove the alkali, afford a sure and ample water supply for irrigation, and make these acres available for use and fully productive. Whether they are Indian lands or whether they are white lands, they are not used as much as formerly and can not be. There are 8,000 acres, approximately, of Indian lands that are subject to some cultivation, and credits have been allowed them for certain structures. These lands need this project.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior must find that the acreage "is feasibly susceptible of economic irrigation and cultivation" before it is brought into the district.

But, furthermore, and this is of special importance as to the 8,000 acres, which Collier says have been "irrigated since before the time of Christ in a highly efficient way," my amendment inserted the further requirement that the Secretary find, before including them, that the land is "materially benefited by this work." If they are materially benefited, and they are, even the 8,000 acres, why should the Indians not repay sometime the cost of the work?

Here is what the bill, as amended, does to these Indians who are being "strangulated" we are told:

First, as to the 8,000 acres that now have some partial use, they are given a priority of water right as against all other lands, including other lands in the district. To-day they have no such guaranteed priority. The bill reads:

Provided further, That all present water rights now appurtenant to approximately 8,346 acres of irrigated Pueblo lands owned individually or as pueblos under the proposed plans of the district, and all water for the domestic purposes of the Indians and for their stock shall be prior and paramount to any rights of the district or any property holder therein, which priority so defined shall be recognized and protected in the agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the said middle Rio Grande conservancy district.

Next, as to the other 15,000 acres of land that are not now used, but which are to be reclaimed by this bill, they are given an equal priority with other lands in the district, forever, while in Indian ownership, whether used or not, and the water rights for newly reclaimed lands shall be recognized as equal to those of like district lands and be protected from discrimination in the division and use of water, and such water rights, old as well as new, shall not be subject to loss by nonuse or abandonment thereof so long as title to said lands shall remain in the Indians individually or as pueblos or the United States. There is a great advantage and a great protection to the Indians. If it were possible to organize this district without those Indian lands, the water would be taken and those 15,000 acres would be forever useless. But under the bill, whether the water is used or not, the Indians are assured it is there when they want it.

They have some use of the 8,000 acres, but under this bill, with these improvements, their beneficial use of these lands will be doubled, if not quadrupled, over what it is to-day; and nothing from the proceeds of those lands is taken, and no lien is to rest upon them. We furnish the $67.50 per acre; we charge it to them on the books, but we take our chance of getting it by improving the lands now entirely unimproved.

As to the 15,000 acres not now used, we are going to make those valuable—worth from $100 to $200 per acre. In fact, since they pay no interest on what we loan to them, the Indians and their advisors should look ahead 25 or 50 years to see what those lands will be worth to these Indians in the future. Those Indians will increase in population. They are now starting out on new lines of progress. Very soon they are going to need those 15,000 acres. Under Mr. Collier's own statement, which I quoted, they need some of them now; but they are useless to-day. This project will make them productive, drained, and with full water right.

GENEROUS TREATMENT OF THE INDIANS

What do the Indians pay? They get their priority established. Their lands—8,000 acres—are made much more productive. The 15,000 acres for the first time will have a value. What do we ask them to do that we are "confiscating" their lands?

The whites must not only pay the money invested but must pay interest; the Indians pay no interest.

The whites will pay $76 an acre; the Indians $67.50.

The whites must pay their debt in 40 years, and their taxes and interest charges besides. The Indians pay no taxes and no interest and are not likely to pay it in 40 years.

The whites pay operation and maintenance cost not only on their lands but on these 8,000 acres of Indian land perpetually. Perpetually is a long, long time; but forever, under the terms of this bill, the Indians are exempt from any charge for operation or maintenance or betterment work done by the district for the 8,000 acres. The little side ditches the Indians will take care of themselves, but the main canals are forever maintained by the whites without any charge to the Indians. The bill reads:

and such irrigated area of approximately 8,346 acres shall not be subject by the district or otherwise to any pro rata share of future operation and maintenance or betterment work performed by the district.

Then consider in the course of time what that is worth to the Indians. Still we are told that Congress is trying to confiscate the lands of the Indians.

The Indians pay nothing from their pockets or from the proceeds from the 8,000 acres. What do they pay? We have confidence enough in the success of the project and what it will do with that 15,000 acres not now used at all that we will take our chances on the success of the project, and the bill does not ask interest but just the principal to reclaim and improve the 23,000 acres and takes it only from the rentals that the Indians secure from the 15,000 acres. The bill reads, as amended:

The share of the cost paid the district on behalf of the Indian lands under the agreement herein authorized, including any sum paid to the district from the fund authorized to be appropriated by the act of February 14, 1927 (44 Stat. 1098), shall be reimbursed to the United States under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That such reimbursement shall be made only from leases or proceeds from the newly reclaimed Pueblo lands, and there is hereby created against such newly reclaimed lands a first lien, which lien shall not be enforced during the period that the title to such lands remains in the pueblos or individual Indian ownership.

This contemplates that the lands reclaimed, which are in communal ownership, will be leased to individual Indians or to whites, Indians, of course, being given the preference. In either case a rental will be asked based on such rentals on similar lands in the valley. The rentals from such leases, whether Indian or white, will be applied to the debt until it is paid and thereafter will go to the pueblo. The Indians will have at hand new areas of desirable land and have no excessive charges to pay for lands now valueless. There is no hardship here. I would prefer "proceeds from leases of newly reclaimed pueblo lands" as clearer, but no doubt the language used means the same.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. I repeat, there is no hardship there. If the project is not successful, nothing will come back to the Treasury. But if it is successful, as I believe it will be, there will be 15,000 acres made productive that are not now productive, and the proceeds of leases of that 15,000 acres now unused we will take to repay what we furnished them.

GUARANTEES THE FUTURE OF THESE PUEBLOS

This bill guarantees the future prosperity of the Pueblos involved. It is fair. It is generous. And if these organizations, such as that led by John Collier, would be constructive, they would be here trying to put it through Congress instead of obstructing its passage. It is not an easy thing to get $1,500,000 from Congress, and this means much to the Indians, much to New Mexico. I have been doing all I could to get this bill through.

There is no gain for the Indian in teaching him to be a mendicant or to expect gifts from the Government. The day of rations proved the insanity of that policy, and we have abandoned it. We ought now to follow the policy of giving the Indian help to help himself. That is what he wants above all else. What this bill does is to help the Indian to help himself. It would be law now except for the misrepresentations and the threats of John Collier. [Applause.]

NAVAL PROGRAM

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] is recognized.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by inserting a tabulation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there are two distinct classes of citizens in this Nation: Those that can see a war cloud in the middle of every sunshiny day and who continuously try to take advantage of every opportunity to involve this country in great expenditures for the kind of preparedness that is believed by many to be useless in time of war; and secondly, the class who take into consideration the economic and financial conditions of this country and the various nations of the world, keeping in mind that the ultimate object of all of the best citizens should be the maintenance of peace with other nations, also keeping in mind that should the Nation be so unfortunate as to become involved in a war that the kind of preparedness we should have would be the newer, more modern kinds of defense that any nation will need to be victorious.

Within the last 48 hours a perfect barrage of propaganda has been given to the citizens of this country in favor of a war program. Monday, Secretary Wilbur started the fireworks at Indianapolis; Tuesday, the press quoted the President of the United States as favoring the construction of this program, but leaving the impression that he would be satisfied with 25 cruisers; and this morning the distinguished gentleman from Illinois gives notice that he has flopped over and again joined the administration in promoting certain features of the proposed legislation, which, according to the figures just presented to the Naval Affairs Committee, covering a five-year program to be completed in nine years, amounts to the enormous sum of $4,176,426,000.

Secretary Wilbur, in his speech made at Indianapolis on Monday, assailed the critics of the administration in support of what he claimed was a program amounting to $740,000,000, which is a sum far less than the actual figures shown in this connection, for the reason this amount does not include the following: $96,650,000 allocated for the building of submarines and cruisers already authorized; $170,070,000 for the five-year aviation program; $76,970,000 for cruisers now being constructed and authorized in the 1928 program; and approximately $540,000,000 for increased personnel and expenses in connection with the proposed new ships. This sum, added to the estimated cost necessary for the upkeep of the Navy and the proposed reconditioning of certain battleships, brings the cost up to more than $4,000,000,000 to be expended during the nine-year period.

Secretary Wilbur, in his Indianapolis speech, complains about those who want the Navy to fight blindfolded, as if there were war clouds on the horizon and this Nation was about to rush into war. What about the aviation program of one hundred and seventy millions? Such tomfoolery as this is what makes the balance of the world despise us. Such unwarranted allegations are what hurts our foreign trade. Admiral Jones has just testified before the Naval Affairs Committee that another disarmament conference will be held in three years, at which all five of the world powers will be represented. If this Nation starts the construction of a program costing more than a billion dollars, we will be in the same attitude as we were in 1922, when it was necessary to scrap nearly $300,000,000 worth of new ships in order to bring about a disarmament agreement.

Yesterday the representatives of the shipbuilding corporations testified that not a single ship could be completed within three years; therefore, if contracts are let for this enormous program, the other nations of the world will be sufficiently wise to realize that the best method of combatting this situation will be to reduce their tonnage to such a figure as to cause us to scrap some more new ships. Every competent witness that has testified before the committee makes the positive statement that no nation on earth can land an army on our shores as long as we have adequate aircraft. It was likewise testified that we could fly our seaplanes out 200 miles from shore and destroy an approaching enemy. Testimony was also given that it would be impossible, even with cruisers, to protect our commerce in time of war, provided the same passed within striking distance of any major nation with which we might be at war.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Can the gentleman give us any information as to how many cruisers and other vessels for war purposes we have under construction at the present time?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I will try to answer that before I get through. I do not want to break the continuity of my speech.

During the World War the submarine was the ship that struck terror to the hearts of the people and was the most feared. To combat this menace the destroyer was found to be the most efficient ship; therefore, if it is necessary to protect this country in the way of a surface shipbuilding program, then the most efficient step that could be taken would be to decommission a lot of old obsolete ships, using the men and officers to man the one hundred and fifty-odd destroyers that we now have tied up at docks at Philadelphia and San Diego, and, in addition, build enough submarines, using the latest safety devices of rescue, so as to make this a real arm of defense.

Everyone knows that the submarine is the only kind of a ship that could possibly enter into the harbor of a city like New York in time of war; therefore, if this is true, why waste our money in building up a peace-time Navy such as the Secretary of the Navy says is indorsed by himself and the President of the United States. Of course, the Navy realizes that unless it gets this building program authorized and started building before the convening of the next disarmament conference the expenditures will never be made, keeping in mind that there are nearly 600 officers in Washington that would welcome berths on new cruisers rather than quarters in submarines and destroyers.

I venture to assert that England and the other powers of the world would not object if the United States should build 100 cruisers, realizing that we could not use them in war, except in protected zones; yet if the so-called war party of this Nation wants to bring about a situation that will startle the world let them suggest the construction of about 60 new submarines and see how quickly this will bring about an international colloquy for the purpose of either banning this type of vessel or causing the same to be the subject of serious consideration at the disarmament conference in Washington in 1931.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It is refreshing to hear one member of the Naval Affairs Committee speak for the people. The rest of the committee usually speak for the Navy. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Does he think these big naval officers will be satisfied with anything but large vessels on which they have their retinues of attendants, and where it takes about four different officers in relays to reach them from the deck to their cabin? They are the kind of ships upon which they like to function in peace times. I want to say to the gentleman that I would like him to give us his idea about the proposal which now comes from the Navy that they shall have an assistant on the floor of the House to speak for the Navy on all questions when a Member of Congress gets up to speak for the people.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I want to say, in answer to the question the gentleman has asked, that there are approximately 600 naval officers in Washington; and all of these officers desire at some time to command a great, big, fine ship that has lovely and luxurious quarters. If I were in the Navy, or if the gentleman were in the Navy, to be perfectly fair and frank about it, he and I would want the same thing. But this is a war program when there is no sign of a war in sight. We ought not to be building for a peace program. We ought to build a program for preparedness. We ought to prepare this Nation so that it will be able to defend itself against any kind of a situation which would ever confront it; and if that is true, taking the lessons of the last war, let us build the kind of a ship which would enable us to stand off every country in the world if that condition should arise. [Applause.] That is the way I view this situation.

As to that part of your question which refers to the Navy having an assistant on the floor of the House to speak for the Navy on all subjects, it is now known that the Navy already prepares practically all of the bills they desire enacted into law which relate to departmental matters. These are either given to the chairman or some member of the committee, who introduces same on the floor of the House; then they go back to the clerk of the committee, who refers them to the same source from which they originated, and a report is made. In many times the report is prepared ahead of the time the bill is introduced. Therefore, according to the present procedure, practically no legislation can be enacted into law without the indorsement of the Navy for the reason the officers in charge of this great bureau have practically a strangle hold on the functions of the committee having jurisdiction over this subject. If anyone in the Navy wants to represent the same on the floor of the House, let him resign his position, go back home, and offer himself as a candidate for Congress; then, if he is elected, he may speak out in any way he sees fit. At the present time this Government suffers from too much bureaucratical control, and it is growing worse. If improvements are not to be had in the very near future, the time will eventually arrive when the people will have to rise up in some forcible manner and demand their rights.

Many students of the Geneva conference are of the opinion that an agreement could have been reached if the United States had agreed to put 6-inch guns on the new type of cruiser desired. However, when it is known that the Navy kept Admiral Jones in England off and on for a period of two years in conference with certain naval officers and that all naval officers are against the reduction of ships, it can be easily understood why the disarmament conference at Geneva was the most successfully concluded of any ever held, from the standpoint of the officers in the Navy.

I am only bringing this to your attention for one reason. I think every class of people in this Nation ought to be properly posted. I think the facts ought to be given to the public, and I am only presenting here what I would like to have presented to me if I were not a member of the Naval Affairs Committee. [Applause.]

Under the leave granted to me I insert the following table, which was prepared by the Navy and submitted to members of the Naval Affairs Committee:

	1929	1930	1931	1932	1933	1934	1935	1936	1937	Totals

W. L. CLAYTON

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the press dispatches in the morning paper carry a statement from W. L. Clayton, of the firm of Anderson, Clayton & Co., in which he denies the statement made by me on the floor of the House a few days ago charging his firm, together with others, with violating the Sherman Antitrust Act in unlawfully manipulating the cotton market. In that dispatch Mr. Clayton says:

> I have never made the boast which Representative RANKIN attributes to me—referring to the charge that he is alleged to have stated that firms other than his own could not hope to avoid loss in the cotton business unless they could correctly guess his mind.

That statement is alleged to have been made in a speech before a general meeting of the New York Cotton Exchange members during May, 1926, and has been repeatedly quoted ever since that time, but this is the first time Mr. Clayton has ever denied it, so far as I have been able to learn.

My authority for that statement is contained in a speech made by Mr. Arthur R. Marsh, a former president of the New York Cotton Exchange, on February 6, 1928, to the exchange members. Mr. Marsh is an authority on cotton. He was recently retained by the Hon. Charles Evans Hughes to prepare a brief on the operation of hedges on cotton exchanges. In his speech to the members of the New York Cotton Exchange on February 6, Mr. Marsh said:

> That responsibility was irrevocably fixed when in this very room, at the general meeting of the members of the New York Cotton Exchange held in May, 1927, Mr. Clayton, with amazing assurance unqualifiedly avowed that firms other than his own can not hope to avoid loss in the cotton business unless they can correctly guess his mind.

No one has denied that Mr. Clayton made this speech, although I understand that several hundred members of the exchange were present when Mr. Marsh made this statement.

I wonder if Mr. Clayton denies having made that speech. If he has been misquoted, is it not passing strange that he never noticed the error until it was brought to light on the floor of the House? Mr. Clayton says in his statement of yesterday:

> My firm has violated no law. We have done nothing of which we or any of our friends need be ashamed. No act of ours has had the intent or the effect of depressing the cotton market.

Let us see about that. Mr. Clayton has not denied, and he can not deny, that his firm and their confederates had shipped from the New Orleans territory and concentrated in New York between one hundred and forty and two hundred thousand bales—largely transfer cotton—at a loss of from $4 to $5 a bale, practically all of which still remains in New York and was shipped there within the last 16 months to be used as a club in manipulating the market and depressing prices.

One of the best witnesses to prove the iniquity of that action is Mr. W. L. Clayton himself, who said in a speech in Atlanta, Ga., on April 9, 1926:

> The October-December operation last season is a concrete example. October, 1924, when practically all cotton was tenderable, went to a premium of about 100 points over December and attracted a stock of 175,000 bales to New York; and under the weight of this cotton December sold at 40 to 50 points under December, New Orleans, whereas the normal parity should be 75 to 80 points over December, New Orleans.

That statement shows that Mr. Clayton knew then that the concentration of this alleged stock of cotton in New York would become a most powerful weapon in the hands of any manipulator for controlling or depressing the cotton market.

In that same speech Mr. Clayton, in speaking of the enormous advantages which his firm has enjoyed, used this astounding language:

> Meantime we must be excused if we fail to feel any sense of commercial perversion in continuing to play the game according to the rules.

Admitting in that speech that he must be excused for failing to feel any sense of commercial perversion, we are not surprised that after carrying out the very same nefarious practices, Mr. Clayton comes out in the press of yesterday and says that he did nothing of which he need feel ashamed.

Mr. Clayton and those confederated with him in this gigantic conspiracy are now pretending to welcome an investigation they are going to get. Not only are they slated for an investigation by the House and Senate of the United States but the Department of Justice as well. And that is likely to prove the most interesting investigation they have ever faced, for it promises also to furnish them with a grand jury investigation, as well as proceedings to seize and confiscate this great bulk of cotton which they have unlawfully concentrated and used to manipulate the cotton market in violation of the law.

Not only that but there are probably other investigations awaiting them. Every person, firm, or corporation from whom they have taken money through these manipulations has a right under the law to go into court, bring suit, and recover judgment for their losses.

Let Congress go to the bottom of this matter, not only in its investigations but also in backing up the Department of Justice in their attempt to clear this condition up in order that we may assure the American people that this will never occur again. [Applause.]

PIONEERS IN THE WOMAN MOVEMENT

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, during the month of January of this year I communicated with the National Woman's Party, whose national headquarters is at 21 First Street NE., Washington, D. C., at the request of some of the club women of my district in Georgia, who were and are interested in obtaining information in respect of the lives of Lucretia Mott, Susan B. Anthony, and Elizabeth Cady Stanton, who were the pioneers of the equal-rights movement, and whose statues are in the crypt of the Capitol.

Personally speaking, I think this statue of these famous and historic women should be taken from its hiding place in the crypt of the Capitol, where few people ever see it, and that it should be placed on the second floor, where all visitors to the Capitol from this country and other nations of the world may have the opportunity of seeing the same.

The just tribute to which these three outstanding women are entitled, and which will probably be the last which this Government will ever be asked to bestow, will never be completed or grow into full fruitage until their statue is placed on the second floor of this Capitol, where it can be seen by visitors as they come and go during the ages to follow. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. That requires congressional action, and if the gentleman would introduce a resolution to that effect, we could then get action and get the statue moved up where it ought to be.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I have been thinking of doing that for some time. The bill for this purpose will be ready for introduction within a day or two.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does the gentleman from Georgia propose to give a history of the life of all three of these ladies or just the one?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I was only asked to give that of Miss Anthony.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does not the gentleman think it would be well to do that as to all three of them?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I do, and I will be glad to comply with the gentleman's suggestion.

In one of the letters from Miss Mabel Vernon, national executive secretary of the National Woman's Party, she stated that they would like to have February 15, the birthday of Susan B. Anthony, observed as widely as possible. She further stated in this letter that they would appreciate it if I would call attention to the work of this great woman on that day on the floor of the House of Representatives. I take pleasure in complying with this request, and now present to the House of Representatives a brief statement of the life and activities of Miss Anthony, which was sent to me by Miss Vernon, and also statements of the lives and activities of Lucretia Mott and Elizabeth Cady Stanton, the same, respectively, being in words and figures as follows:

SUSAN B. ANTHONY—MILITANT SUFFRAGIST (1820–1906)

Born in South Adams, Mass., February 15, 1820.

Died in Rochester, N. Y., March 13, 1906.

Father: A cotton manufacturer and liberal Quaker, who educated his daughters to be self-supporting. Moved to Rochester in 1848.

Teaching: Taught in New York from 1835 to 1850. When she was 17 she received $1.50 a week and "boarded 'round"—excellent wages for a woman.

SUFFRAGE AND EQUAL-RIGHTS WORK

1852. Met Mrs. Stanton, the suffrage leader, at Seneca Falls. Joined Mrs. Stanton, Horace Greeley, and others in an attempt to have women admitted to the "People's College," then being started. But it was merged into Cornell and women excluded.

At the temperance convention in Albany, to which she was a delegate, she rose to speak to a motion, but was rebuked by the presiding officer, who told her that "the sisters were not invited to speak but to listen and learn." She and three or four other women left the hall.

1853. The first woman to speak on the floor of a teachers' convention. She helped to introduce a resolution for recognition of the right of women teachers to equal pay, which was carried despite the president's protests.

1854. Held suffrage meetings in every county in New York. Held suffrage conventions in every year after that up to Civil War. Petitions for suffrage and equal guardianship rights for women drawn up at State suffrage convention were presented to New York Legislature.

Canvassed New York annually with similar petitions to the legislature. Traveled to many towns off the railroad line, enduring many hardships.

1859. Forced to abandon speaking because of a breakdown in health, she continued writing and circularizing. She wrote: "No genuine equality, no real freedom, no true manhood or womanhood can exist on any foundation save that of pecuniary independence."

1861. Persuaded to give up preparations for the annual women's rights convention to concentrate on work to win the war, though she was not misled by the sophistry that the rights of women would be recognized after the war if they helped to end it.

1863. Organized Woman's National Loyal League to support the Government in the Civil War.

1864. She agitated for the inclusion of women in the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. Even the abolitionists opposed her, saying, "This is the negro's hour." Miss Anthony then decided to devote more effort to State campaigns so that the demand of women for national enfranchisement would have behind it the power of votes.

1872. Arrested.

She determined to test the fifteenth amendment. She was allowed to register in Rochester and to cast her ballot. She was arrested, tried, and found guilty by an instructed jury. A fine was imposed, which she refused to pay, saying, "I shall earnestly and persistently continue to urge all women to the practical recognition of the old revolutionary maxim, 'Resistance to tyranny is obedience to God.'"

1878. Secured the introduction for the first time in the United States Senate of a Federal suffrage amendment in the same form in which the nineteenth amendment was finally passed.

ATTITUDE ON POLITICS

Miss Anthony's attitude toward political parties is illustrated by her words, "My view of our true position is to hold ourselves as a balance of power, to give aid and comfort to the party which shall inscribe on its banners 'Freedom to women.' I do not expect any man to see and act with me, but I do not understand how any woman can do otherwise than refuse to accept any party which ignores her sex."

Immediately upon the mention of the claims of women in the platform of the Republican Party Miss Anthony made an effort to have the Democrats follow suit. Her political policy was adopted by the National Woman's Party and followed from 1913 on.

1896. Entered the presidential campaigns and spoke for suffrage at every party convention.

Continuously until her death in 1906 worked for suffrage in State-to-State campaigns. She always advocated securing suffrage by Federal action and constantly protested to Congress against the necessity of laborious State-by-State campaigns; but she realized that Congress would not act until women had sufficient voting power in the States to compel it.

Throughout her life Miss Anthony's watchword was "No compromise."

TO SUSAN B. ANTHONY

Something there was that you imagined not,
For all your wisdom, temperate and high,
How unto us, to whom the kinder years
Secure a fairer fight, an easier lot,
Your name would be a creed, a battle cry,
A silver trumpet blowing to the sky.
Steeling our hearts, filling our eyes with tears,
Giving us fire and fortitude and love;
This was, alas! a thing you never guessed—
How younger women whom you knew not of
Would rise and call you blessed.

LUCRETIA MOTT

Lucretia Mott was born January 3, 1793, on the island of Nantucket, the second child of Thomas and Anna Coffin. Her ancestors had lived on the island of Nantucket since its first settlement by white men in 1659. Lucretia spent her childhood there and many times in later life refers to the years she spent on this island.

Captain Coffin, Lucretia's father, was engaged in the sea trade with East India and was often gone long from his home. At those times her mother, Anna Coffin, with six little children carried on the activities of the home. Lucretia, writing in her diary of those early days, said: "In those early days I was actively useful to my mother, who in the absence of my father on his long voyages carried on a mercantile business and often made trips to Boston to purchase goods." The exercise of women's talents in this line, as well as the general care which devolved on them in the absence of their husbands, tended to develop and strengthen them mentally and physically.

Captain Coffin with his family moved to Boston in 1804.

At 13 years of age Lucretia, with a younger sister, was sent to the Friends Boarding School at Nine Partners, N. Y. At this school she became a fast friend of Sarah Mott, a sister of James Mott, whom she afterwards married.

After two years as pupil she was appointed assitsant teacher at a salary of $100 a year. At the end of the year she received further promotion as regular teacher, with the inducement that in this position her younger sister would be entitled to her education.

The family moved to Philadelphia in 1809.

In 1811, in her nineteenth year, Lucretia married James Mott. In their young married life there were many turns of fortune, all of which she met in heroic manner.

When their little family was growing about them and Mr. Mott was becoming prosperous in business, Mrs. Mott, now 25 years of age, felt called to a more public life and engaged in the ministry of the Society of Friends and became an inspiring preacher and lecturer.

In all her efforts she had the cordial support of her husband. The names of James and Lucretia Mott were inseparably linked in their public activities. Their home was a meeting place for eminent persons, including visitors from abroad.

In 1840 a world's antislavery convention was called in London. Women from Boston, New York, and Philadelphia were delegates to that convention. Lucretia Mott was one of the delegates, but on her arrival in England her credentials were not accepted because she was a woman.

At this convention she met Elizabeth Cady Stanton. Mrs. Mott and Mrs. Stanton, sitting in the railed-off space assigned to women, had listened to a long debate on the question of admitting women as members of the convention. They had heard the last thing before adjournment the overwhelming chorus of "noes" that barred women out. They left the hall together, "burning with indignation," and resolved on their way back to their lodgings that when they went home they would call a convention to take up just one thing—the rights of women.

The result of this meeting was the first women's rights convention in Seneca Falls, N. Y., July 19 and 20, 1848.

The Declaration of Independence was chosen as a model for a "declaration of sentiments" to be presented at the convention, and a list of 18 grievances was collected to match the 18 set forth by the declaration of 1776.

This enumeration complains of the deprivation of the franchise; the exclusion from legislative bodies; civil death upon marriage; moral irresponsibility for crimes committed in the presence of the husband; loss of property rights upon marriage; inequality in the laws of divorce and guardianship of children; taxation without representation; exclusion from nearly all profitable employments, and discrimination in pay in those employments which she is permitted to follow; exclusion from teaching theology, medicine, or law; exclusion from all colleges; exclusion from the ministry and an equal participation in the affairs of the church; and the creation of a false public sentiment through the promulgation of two codes of morals. It concludes "He has endeavored in every way that he could to destroy her confidence in her own powers, to lessen her self-respect, and to make her willing to lead a dependent and abject life."

As the "declaration of sentiments" covered the entire feminist program, the resolutions have a familiar ring. Thus we find an important aim of the Woman's Party in the fourth resolution "that the women of this country ought to be enlightened in regard to the laws under which they live that they may no longer publish their degradation by declaring themselves satisfied with their present position, nor their ignorance by asserting that they have all the rights they want."

No man was called in the first day of the convention, when the real work was done in a meeting of which no record seems to have been preserved. It was hastily decided on the second day not only to permit the men to remain but to make James Mott chairman of the meeting. Mrs. Mott was an experienced and self-possessed speaker, but was handicapped for the position of chairman by a light voice.

The Seneca Falls convention adjourned after two days, but so many points of discussion had developed that it was agreed to have another meeting at Rochester two weeks later. This meeting was filled to overflowing.

In 1852 Mrs. Mott was elected president of the women's rights convention at Syracuse. The Syracuse Standard reports that she presided with an ease, dignity, and grace that might be envied by the most experienced legislator in the country.

Mrs. Mott was the first president of the Equal Rights Association, founded in New York in 1866.

She presided in January, 1869, at the first woman suffrage convention ever held in Washington. All associations friendly to woman's rights were invited to send delegates to this convention.

The last convention at which Lucretia Mott appeared was the convention of the National Woman Suffrage Association in 1879, when she was 86 years old.

Lucretia Mott spent her last days at Roadside, near Philadelphia. She died November 11, 1880, and is buried in the Friends Burying Ground at Fair Hill. At the time of her death memorial services were held in many cities throughout the country, at which tribute was paid to her life and work.

Carrying on the fight for equality in which Lucretia Mott led the way, the Woman's Party is now working for an amendment to the United States Constitution which provides: "Men and women shall have equal rights throughout the United States and every place subject to its jurisdiction." This amendment is called the "Lucretia Mott amendment."

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, ONE OF THE THREE PIONEERS IN THE WOMAN MOVEMENT

Elizabeth Cady was born at Johnstown, N. Y., November 12, 1815, the daughter of Daniel Cady, judge of the Supreme Court and Court of Appeals of New York, and of Margaret Livingston Cady, the daughter of Col. James Livingston, of General Washington's staff. She married Henry Brewster Stanton in 1840, and in May of that year attended the World's Antislavery Convention in London. Mrs. Stanton and other women were not allowed to take seats because of their sex. She and Lucretia Mott decided to call a woman's rights convention upon their return to America. Together they wrote the call to the Seneca Falls convention of 1848. At the first session Mrs. Stanton offered a resolution demanding the ballot for women as the most important right, which was adopted in the face of protest.

In 1863 Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony formed the Woman's Loyal League, of which Mrs. Stanton was president. In 1867 the two women established The Revolution, a political newspaper, of which Mrs. Stanton was editor in chief.

In 1869 was founded the National Woman's Suffrage Association, of which Mrs. Stanton was president more than 25 years. At the convention of the association in Washington in 1878 Mrs. Stanton brought forward the demand for a separate woman suffrage amendment.

Mrs. Stanton conceived the idea of the International Council of Women and presided at the first meeting in Washington, March, 1888.

She worked for and helped to secure in some States property rights for women, equal guardianship laws, and their right to their own wages.

She died October 26, 1902, the last document she signed being a plea for liberty for women, which appeared in an editorial in a New York newspaper.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow morning, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes concerning the passage of the bill S. 700, as amended in the House, along the line of the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10635) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10635, with Mr. MICHENER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read down to and including line 4 on page 56.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, yesterday when the paragraph on the Coast Guard was considered I was called out of the Chamber. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the committee for seven minutes on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and his subcommittee for their treatment of the Coast Guard in this bill, and especially in their recognition of the fact that new buildings and repairs are so vitally necessary. There are more Coast Guard stations in my district than any other in America, and it is my pleasure to know all the men in the service down there, and to appreciate the magnificent work they have done. The Coast Guard is one of the least understood and one of the least known of our departments of Government, and they have no papers or press agents to carry what they are doing to the country.

Did you know—

That in the last fiscal year they saved or rescued from peril 3,313 human souls, the largest number in any one year since the organization of the service, and that the total number of assistance rendered was 5,508?

Did you know—

That the value of the ships and cargoes assisted was $37,801,357, and that in the enforcement of the laws of the United States—navigation, motor boat, and custom laws—68,223 vessels were boarded and examined during the year?

Did you know—

That in the Mississippi floods last spring the Coast Guard removed 43,853 persons from perilous positions and saved 11,313 herds of livestock?

Those are just a few examples of a phase of their work that is not generally known. In recent years the Coast Guard has been called upon to enforce a law, the righteousness or possible unwisdom of which is not to be discussed, but the fact is that, having to administer this law, the great and noble purpose for which they were created is being fast overshadowed, and in some sections they have become the target for slurs and falsehoods and insinuations.

When the marine is carried away from his country and loved ones to chase Sandino, he does not stop to question what his Government's foreign policy is. When the man in the Navy is carried to eastern waters and landed in China, he does not stop to reason why. When the man in the Army is called out to preserve the peace, he does not ask why he is there. And so it is not in the province of the Coast Guard, nor do they question the wisdom of a law they are called on to enforce, but perform their duty with a singleness of purpose and unafraid. And yet the marine and the soldier and the sailor are not criticized for obeying orders, while the Coast Guard in the performance of their duty are having hurled at their heads in some sections the terms "spy," "detective," and "snooper."

They are exposed to more temptations than any men in any service anywhere. Snags and pitfalls are thrown across their path, but to their everlasting credit they are meeting the test and coming out unscathed. Just a few months ago in this campaign of detraction that has been carried on against the Coast Guard in some sections, there was published in one of the leading magazines in the country an article carrying the inference that the service was shot through with graft. I tell you, both from knowledge, information, and investigation that it is a miserable lie and a slander and insult offered to brave men.

I want to see this great organization expand and grow. I want to see the ambitions and aspirations that its great admiral—and he is an administrative genius—has for the service realized. I want to see the housing facilities at many of the stations so improved that at least the men may have the ordinary comforts of life. I want to see the man when he enters the service have the incentive that after he has served his Government loyally and faithfully for 30 long years in this perilous work, that he may be retired upon his option. I want to see every man in charge of an active station a warrant officer. I want to see Congress abandon its policy of indifference and neglect, and hereafter give this organization the necessary appropriations to decently and efficiently operate.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman must know, I assume, that the Coast Guard has the same retirement privileges that the Army and the Navy have.

Mr. WARREN. I fully understand that.

Mr. MADDEN. I was wondering what the gentleman meant by stating he wanted to see them have retirement privileges.

Mr. WARREN. I did not say retirement. Here is what I was going to say: Some day, when we have more men here in Congress who think in terms of human rather than property rights, we are going to make a fight to place the Coast Guard under the pension laws of the country, where they ought to be.

Mr. MADDEN. They have better provisions now. They have the retirement privileges that the Army and the Navy have.

Mr. WARREN. I fully understand that, but they are not under the pension laws like the Army and the Navy.

Mr. MADDEN. They are; exactly.

Mr. WARREN. Well, I still beg leave to disagree with the gentleman, and I will point that out later.

The man in the Coast Guard is just as much in the service of his country as the man in the Army and Navy, for in time of war they are part of the armed forces; but yet, when one of them dies or is killed in the performance of his duty or is foully murdered, as is frequently the case, their loved ones receive a notation that he was a brave man, and they are granted six months' pay. Pitiful cases of distress and need are coming in from all sections.

Mr. BULWINKLE. If the gentleman will permit, they have the same rights with respect to war-risk insurance as the men in the Army and the Navy at the present time.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that.

Now, answering the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], of course I know that the same retirement law applies to the Army, the Navy, and the Coast Guard. When a man in the Army or Navy is killed in the performance of his duty his dependents come under the pension laws. This is not true of the Coast Guard, and this discrimination is what I am protesting against. Just recently a fine young man in the service from my district was brutally murdered in the performance of his duty in Florida. He left a wife and several small children, who are destitute. The only aid they got was six months' salary under the retirement act. I know that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has been a consistent friend of the Coast Guard, and I hope that we will have the benefit of his great influence to remedy this discrimination.

Our Government is too great and too fair to mete out this injustice and to tolerate this situation to exist much longer.

I love to think of the Coast Guard, gentlemen of the House, as fulfilling the mission for which it was created. I like to think of it as serving humanity. I like to picture the sun-crowned but lonely patrol on our wind-swept coast burning his Coston signal to herald that succor is near.

I like to picture the man in the lookout with his eagle eye sweeping the sea in his eternal vigil. I like to picture them in their surfboats through mountainous seas and storms and tempests snatching men from the very jaws of death. I like to picture them as firing the gun and sending true the line, and with strong hands and fearless hearts bringing in to safety human beings who had despaired of all. I like to see them in their stations rendering aid and sympathy and love to the unfortunate sojourners whom fate throws up in their midst. That is what the Coast Guard is. That is my conception of the service. That is where their heart is, and that is why their deeds have been one grand epic that sweeps down the decades.

They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters—these see the works of the Lord and his wonders in the deep.

The Clerk read as follows:

Operating supplies: For fuel, steam, gas for lighting and heating purposes, water, ice, lighting supplies, electric current for lighting, heating, and power purposes, telephone service for custodial forces; removal of ashes and rubbish, snow, and ice; cutting grass and weeds, washing towels, and miscellaneous items for the use of the custodial forces in the care and maintenance of completed and occupied public buildings and the grounds thereof under the control of the Treasury Department, and in the care and maintenance of the equipment and furnishings in such buildings; miscellaneous supplies, tools, and appliances required in the operation (not embracing repairs) of the mechanical equipment, including heating, plumbing, hoisting, gas piping, ventilating, vacuum-cleaning and refrigerating apparatus, electric-light plants, meters, interior pneumatic-tube and intercommunicating telephone systems, conduit wiring, call-bell and signal systems in such buildings, and for the transportation of articles or supplies, authorized herein (including the customhouse in the District of Columbia, but excluding any other public building under the control of the Treasury Department within the District of Columbia, and excluding also marine hospitals and quarantine stations, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, and personal services, except for work done by contract or for temporary job labor under exigency not exceeding at one time the sum of $100 at any one building), $3,090,000. The appropriation made herein for gas shall include the rental and use of gas governors when ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury in writing: Provided, That rentals shall not be paid for such gas governors greater than 35 per cent of the actual value of the gas saved thereby, which saving shall be determined by such tests as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to contract for the purchase of fuel for public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department in advance of the availability of the appropriation for the payment thereof. Such contracts, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 63, line 17, after the word "that," insert the word "hereafter."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, we have been carrying this language for a great many years. It requires the Secretary of the Treasury to get a supply of coal in advance—to contract for it a year in advance. It has been carried for a long time, and there has been no objection to it. It ought to be carried, and I see no reason why we should not make it permanent; and that is the reason we are offering the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMERICAN PRINTING HOUSE FOR THE BLIND

To enable the American Printing House for the Blind more adequately to provide books and apparatus for the education of the blind in accordance with the provisions of the act approved August 4, 1919, $65,000.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 64, line 13, after the figures "$65,000," insert a colon and add the following: "Provided, That the sum herein appropriated shall not be expended unless two copies of each publication printed by the American Printing House for the Blind during the fiscal year 1929 shall be furnished free of charge to the National Library for the Blind, located in Washington, D. C."

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that that is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be pleased to hear from the gentleman from Tennessee as to the authority of law.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the amendment does not carry any legislation. It is purely a limitation. It does not instruct or direct the American Printing House Co.; there is no provision directing the American Printing House for the Blind to furnish the publications. It simply says if it does not furnish them it shall not get the money. There is no legislation in the amendment. There is no duty imposed on this printing institution in Louisville, Ky.; it is not required to furnish them; it is simply a limitation on the appropriation that it is not to be available unless they do the thing provided in the amendment. I insist that there is no legislation in it, and it is not subject to a point of order.

I am perfectly aware that any limitation which carries with it legislation or which imposes additional duties on officials of the Government is subject to a point of order. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, the American Printing House for the Blind is not a Government institution. Therefore if it carried direction to that printing house to supply these books it would not be subject to the objection that it was imposing additional duties on Government officials. In addition to that, I repeat that there is nothing in the amendment requiring the American Printing House for the Blind to furnish books. It simply says if you do not do it you do not get the money.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I am not able to agree with the gentleman from Tennessee. The language of the amendment is ingeniously drawn and its purpose is legislation. The acts of Congress of 1919 and 1927 which authorize the appropriation of money for the American Printing House for the Blind relate back to and tie into the basic act of 1879, the act of Congress which provided that the money appropriated thereunder for the purpose of the American Printing House for the Blind shall be expended for books and periodicals for the education of the blind of the entire country and shall be apportioned to the schools for the blind in all the States of the Union and to the Territories, including the District of Columbia, according to the number of blind pupils in these schools as regularly and annually certified by the superintendents of the respective schools for this purpose.

Now, these acts which determine how this money shall be expended limit the application of funds made under appropriations for these schools for the blind; that is to say, to those that have been established agreeably to the laws of the States and Territories.

To-day these books and apparatus which, under the basic law, must be furnished to the schools for the education of the blind in the country without a cent of profit on their production to the American Printing House for the Blind, are distributed in this way, and the purpose of the amendment is to set aside the existing law to the extent of making it mandatory as to $1,280 worth of books that they shall furnish the National Library for the Blind, which is a private institution, though receiving a gratuity of $5,000 a year under congressional appropriation, and which is not entitled under existing law to receive any of these books at all. Hence, the amendment, if adopted, will change the basic law of Congress.

I submit, therefore, that the proposed amendment is legislation pure and simple, and it illustrates the wisdom of the rule that legislation should not come in this form on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the Chair unduly. Much that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THATCHER] has said refers to the merits of the amendment. That is a matter for discussion if the amendment should be held in order. My point is simply this: Congress heretofore passed acts authorizing certain appropriations. Of course the Chair is familiar with the fact that merely because an act has been passed authorizing an appropriation it is not necessary for Congress to make the appropriation, either in the amount named in the authorization act or any part of it, if Congress does not see fit to do so. The authorization act simply provides that Congress may do it if it sees fit on an appropriation bill, and brings it within the rules of the House.

Here is an appropriation of $65,000 in addition to the $10,000 which is carried under a permanent appropriation. This amendment simply provides that this $65,000 herein appropriated shall not be expended unless the American Printing House for the Blind shall furnish to the National Library for the Blind, located here in the city of Washington, to the upkeep of which our Government contributes, two copies of each publication during the fiscal year 1929. There is no legislation in that. If the American Printing House for the Blind does not want to furnish the copies, it need not do it, but it will not get the appropriation unless it does. There is no direction or duty sought to be imposed. The amendment simply provides that if they want the $65,000 they have to supply this National Library for the Blind in the District of Columbia with two copies free of these publications. I insist that it is not legislation and no duty or obligation is imposed upon the American Printing House for the Blind.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the law of 1879 clearly obligates this institution, the American Printing House for the Blind, to contribute books and prints to public institutions of learning for the blind in the States. I apprehend there has been no question about the fulfillment of that obligation. The amendment offered by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] obligates the American Printing House for the Blind to supply two books of each kind printed to the National Library for the Blind, located in the city of Washington. It is a library, not a public institution of learning, such as is referred to in the States. The question arises, Shall we differentiate between what the act originally said, under which the American Printing House for the Blind is compelled to supply books to these educational institutions in the States, and a library for the blind, privately owned, privately operated, to which the Government, it is true contributes something annually, though I apprehend that that has nothing to do with the point of order? The only question that arises in my mind is whether the National Library for the Blind comes within the rule laid down in the law of 1879 requiring the Printing House for the Blind to contribute these books. If it comes within that law, of course I apprehend that the amendment is not necessary. If it does not come within the law, then the amendment would be clearly without the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The law seems to refer to public institutions. If this library for the blind is a public institution, then there would be some justification for holding the amendment in order. The precedents of the House hold that a limitation accompanied by an affirmative direction to a departmental officer by the use of the word "unless," he shall do some particular thing, is, in effect, legislation and therefore not in order.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS. I again call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this is not a public institution and this is therefore not an instruction, as I said, to any departmental officer or any officer of the Government. It is purely a private institution.

Mr. THATCHER. But this is under the general supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, and reports must be made to the Secretary of the Treasury, and this appropriation is made under the auspices of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The law provides that these copies may be furnished upon the "request" of the institution. The amendment provides a direction to deliver, notwithstanding that no request has been made, but not until certain prescribed action has been taken. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNS: Page 64, line 13, after the figures "$65,000," insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be expended until the said American Printing House for the Blind shall have filed with the Treasurer of the United States an agreement in writing that it will furnish free of charge to the National Library for the Blind, located in Washington, D. C., two copies of each publication printed by said American Printing House for the Blind during the fiscal year 1929."

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order against that amendment for the same reason, that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, the Chair in his ruling stated that the former amendment was a direction to the American Printing House for the Blind to furnish copies of these publications. I respectfully insist that in that amendment and in the amendment now pending there is absolutely and positively no direction to the American Printing House for the Blind to furnish any publications. There is no effort and no purpose in the amendment to compel the American Printing House for the Blind to furnish any publication to the National Library for the Blind, located here in Washington. It simply provides that if they want this $65,000 they must furnish them. If they do not want to do that, then this $65,000 remains in the Treasury and is not paid over to them. It is simply a question whether the American Printing House for the Blind wishes to furnish the publications, or whether it prefers not to furnish them and not take the appropriation.

Now something has been said here, Mr. Chairman, about the merits of this proposition. I have in my hand here a statement that shows that of the $25,000 appropriated under the last act passed, $12,680 went to increase of salaries. Among those increases—and remember it is a private institution—the superintendent had his salary increased from $5,000 to $6,500, and then provided a new assistant superintendent at $2,500. Then they gave to the printing people and the pressmen little increases of about $60 a year. So that when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THATCHER] says that this is for the purpose of distributing books free to the States, he is not wholly correct. It seems to me that this semipublic institution here in Washington, which has 13,000 volumes and which furnishes these 13,000 volumes on request to any institution throughout the Union, and for which the Federal Government, through the District of Columbia appropriation bill, appropriates $5,000 a year, is worthy of consideration. Former Senator Gore, of Oklahoma, who is the chairman of the National Library for the Blind, insists that it is important for this very worthy institution. It has an endowment, but it could not get along without the appropriation from the Government.

Now, what are we asking of this Louisville institution, which has been drawing $10,000 since 1879, and $40,000 since 1918, and $75,000 for the past year? To contribute something which on its own admission will not cost more than $1,200 a year. I am rather surprised that there should be any objection on the part of that institution to make this little contribution to the institution for the blind here in Washington, which can hardly get along with the $5,000 which the Government appropriates through the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Now, I insist, Mr. Chairman, that in this amendment there is not the slightest legislation. It is simply a limitation pure and simple, requiring, as many other appropriation items do, that "if you get this money, you must file a written agreement that you will furnish these few books to the National Library." It is entirely optional. It does not impose any legislative duty whatever upon the American Printing House for the Blind or any other institution. It is such a limitation as appears in many other appropriation bills.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman, the facts with respect to these questions about the salaries granted have been thrashed out before the committee and accepted, and they have been reported to the Treasury Department, and the amounts accepted as being reasonable and justified, and estimates have been submitted and appropriations accordingly made. I am sorry that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has brought this subject in at this stage of the matter, because I think it has no bearing on the question at issue.

Now, the last amendment seeks to do by indirection what can not be done directly. I call the attention of the chairman to the act of March 3, 1879, which provides that certain books and apparatus shall each year be distributed among all the public institutions and establishments for the education of the blind. I read:

1. The income upon the bonds thus held in trust for the education of the blind shall be expended by the trustees of the American Printing House each year in manufacturing and furnishing embossed books for the blind and tangible apparatus for their instruction. And the total amount of such books and apparatus so manufactured and furnished by this income shall each year be distributed among all the public institutions for the education of the blind in the States and Territories of the United States and the District of Columbia, upon the requisition of the superintendent of each, duly certified by its board of trustees. The basis of such distribution shall be the total number of pupils in all the public institutions for the education of the blind, to be authenticated in such manner and as often as the trustees of the said American Printing House shall require; and each institution shall receive, in books and apparatus, that portion of the total income of said bonds, held by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in trust for the education of the blind, as is shown by the ratio between the number of pupils in that institution for the education of the blind and the total number of pupils in all the public institutions for the education of the blind, which ratio shall be computed upon the first Monday in January of each year.

2. No part of the income from said bonds shall be expended in the erection or leasing of buildings.

3. No profit shall be put on any books or tangible apparatus for the instruction of the blind manufactured or furnished by the trustees of said American Printing House for the Blind, located in Louisville, Ky., and the price put upon each article so manufactured or furnished shall only be its actual cost.

4. The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall have the authority to withhold the income arising from said bonds thus set apart for the education of the blind of the United States whenever he shall receive satisfactory proof that the trustees of said American Printing House for the Blind, located in Louisville, Ky., are not using the income from these bonds for the benefit of the blind in the public institutions for the education of the blind of the United States.

5. Before any money be paid to the treasurer of the American Printing House for the Blind by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, the treasurer of the American Printing House for the Blind shall execute a bond, with two approved sureties, to the amount of $20,000, conditioned that the interest so received shall be expended according to this law and all amendments thereto, which shall be held by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and shall be renewed every two years.

6. The superintendent of the various public institutions for the education of the blind in the United States shall each ex officio be a member of the board of trustees of the American Printing House for the Blind, located in the city of Louisville, Ky.

* * * * * * *

IV. That the trustees of said American Printing House for the Blind shall annually make to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States a report of the items of their expenditure of the income of said bonds during the year preceding their report, and shall annually furnish him with a voucher from each public institution for the education of the blind, showing that the amount of books and tangible apparatus due has been received.

V. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

I may say in passing that the State of Kentucky, which was the pioneer in printing for the blind in this country, began in 1858 to carry on this work. It was quite successful in a local way, with the result that institutions all over the country for the education of the blind joined in requests and made contribution for the purchase of books at cost furnished by the American Printing House for the Blind, and finally Congress passed the act of 1879, prescribing the terms on which books might be printed there for distribution all over the country to the institutions where the blind children were being educated. The State of Kentucky has contributed as a gratuity about $125,000 to $150,000 worth of property at Louisville, without one cent of advantage over any other State in the Union; and if this amendment should be adopted, it means that the blind schools of Texas and Minnesota and New York and every other State in the Union will have their allocations of books for use reduced to the extent that books may be furnished this Washington library.

Mr. BYRNS. May I ask, how much will this cost the American Printing House for the Blind?

Mr. THATCHER. It will cost nearly $1,300 a year.

Mr. BYRNS. How much was the superintendent's salary increased just a year ago?

Mr. THATCHER. It was over a year ago.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to ask the gentleman another question, so he can answer all of these questions. Was not his salary increased $1,500, from $5,000 to $6,500, and did they not provide for a new assistant superintendent at $2,500 just about a year ago? I submit, if the gentleman's argument be correct, that in the increase which was made then they were cutting the institutions out of their just deserts?

Mr. THATCHER. I will answer the gentleman on that. The present superintendent of this institution was formerly the superintendent for the blind in the State of Texas. He was the unanimous choice of the superintendents of the United States when they assembled, and he was told that if he would give up his work in Texas and take charge of this important work, which needed a superintendent, he would be paid in a short time $6,500, which he considered as being necessary in order to justify him in giving up his work in Texas.

Mr. BYRNS. How long has he been serving as superintendent?

Mr. THATCHER. Not over two or three years.

Mr. BYRNS. Then they waited for some time before they increased his salary because his salary only went into effect in May, 1927.

Mr. THATCHER. I understand, but the superintendents of the United States agreed to that, and he is only in the position to-day because of the agreement that he should receive that salary if he would give up his work in Texas. As to the other increases, the American Printing House for the Blind has a work that is very technical and very difficult, and these increases were made after the compensation of those employed in every other element of industry in the country had been increased on account of war conditions and after-war conditions. These questions have been gone into by the subcommittees dealing with this appropriation, and they have been shown that these increases were justified.

This proposed amendment undertakes to change the law and to make it obligatory, in order that this appropriation may function at all, that two copies of each of these publications shall be furnished to this particular library, a private institution, at a cost of something like $1,300 a year. I submit, if that can be done, then the 50 or 60 other libraries for the blind in this country will have the same right and the same justification for asking that they be treated in the same way.

Mr. REED of New York. That is exactly what other institutions will do. The minute you provide that this library shall receive these copies, then every other library in the country will be demanding the same thing.

Mr. BYRNS. How could they demand it with any degree of justice?

Mr. REED of New York. They could do it, and would do it if this action were taken.

Mr. BYRNS. There are no other institutions in any State and there are no other libraries for which the States or Congress appropriates $75,000 as a gratuity, as is the case in connection with the American Printing House for the Blind, and it seems to me it is a very little thing for the Federal Government, which appropriates as a gratuity $75,000 to this private institution, to ask that it give $1,300 worth of publications to this institution in Washington.

Mr. THATCHER. If this action were taken with regard to this institution here there would be the same reason for such action with reference to the other 60 libraries in this country, and they would be making requests of the same character. Every dollar of the $75,000 appropriated by Congress is expended in the cost of books and apparatus for the blind pupils of the United States, including the Territories and the District of Columbia. The American Printing House for the Blind exists only for this purpose, and it is altogether dependent on this appropriation, and books and apparatus furnished to the schools for the blind throughout the country under the basic act of Congress must be, and are, furnished at cost on a pro rata basis of blind-school population in the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The discussion on the floor has been largely with reference to the merits of the proposition. The Chair is not passing on the merits.

It seems to the Chair that this amendment is clearly a limitation with an affirmative direction. A limitation simply provides that money shall not be spent for a specific purpose. This amendment goes further and says that this money shall not be spent unless or until certain things are done.

One particular decision has been called to the attention of the Chair, rendered in Committee of the Whole, on February 20, 1926, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] was in the chair. At that time the following amendment was offered:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: On page 6, line 1, after the figures "$3,000,000," insert a colon and the following: "Provided further,

That not more than one-half of this sum shall be expended unless or until plans and estimates are proposed and approved by said commission for the erection near Sechault, France"—

And so on. In passing upon a point of order made against the amendment the Chairman said:

From a careful reading of section 2, which has been read by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], it seems to the Chair that the gentleman's amendment, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] says, directs the commission to do a specific thing, actually changing the basic law creating the commission, and that the amendment does not restrict in any sense the appropriation.

Now, the Chair after examining these two amendments finds that in intent they are very similar.

It can not be said that this amendment restricts the appropriation alone, but goes further and directs that certain things shall be done. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to postmasters, $52,000,000.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure to me to take this opportunity to recommend H. R. 5837, introduced by Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. The purpose this bill seeks to accomplish should have been done by Congress many years ago.

The inadequate compensation of the group of faithful public servants the measure is designed to increase has long been a reproach upon the Government. No better evidence need be produced to prove the tardiness of legislation when it comes to rectifying wrongs than the record of neglect in respect to the matters this bill is intended to rectify. Every few years Congress has been enacting legislation to increase the compensation of different groups of postal employees, so that they will more nearly accord with the salaries paid in the industries, so that they will correspond with the increasing costs of living, so that they will provide for the faithful supervisors, carriers, clerks, and laborers wages upon which they can support their families, yet it is astonishing to note that the postmasters of a group of the largest offices in the country, upon whom the heavy responsibilities of management rest, have been ignored.

In saying this I want to make it clear that I do not consider we have yet done all that should be done to aid these faithful employees I have enumerated, for there is pressing need of providing additional grades for them to which they may be promoted as rewards for long service, exceptional efficiency, and so forth, and likewise need for legislation to ameliorate their working conditions. When the opportunity offers for me to support measures of this character it is my purpose to do so, but the measure to which I am now referring is to care for the small group of postmasters who have been, as I have previously said, so long ignored, and it is to this matter I wish particularly to address myself at this time.

As examples of cases of injustice such as I have in mind, of inadequately compensated postmasters, let me instance the two postmasters in my home city—Brooklyn and New York.

The salary of the postmaster at New York was fixed by Congress at but $8,000, 53 years ago, or, to be exact, May 3, 1875, and it has never been increased since.

At the time Congress acted in this matter we had not yet celebrated the centennial anniversary of this country's birth, and the progress which has since been achieved by the world in science, the arts, and industry is probably greater than the achievements of the world in these directions in all the time which went before. While everything else in the world has moved forward and upward, these salaries have stood absolutely still.

It would be altogether superfluous for me to remind the House of the increased cost of living during these 53 years. Not only has the cost of living kept soaring higher but the standard of living has kept pace with the rising costs, so that the incumbent of this office is not only obliged to spend more for the necessities which sufficed his predecessor in 1875 but he has to live according to the higher standards of to-day, and conform with habits, usages, and practices which were in those so far distant days quite unknown.

In the year 1875, when the salary for the New York postmaster was fixed, the total receipts of the entire postal system of the United States were a little less than one-third of the receipts of the New York post office in 1927. Of course, with the enormous increase in receipts there has come a corresponding increase in the responsibilities of the postmaster. His bond under the law covers every cent of this vast sum, and of many millions more involved in the money order and postal savings transactions which occur in the New York office.

In my investigation of this subject I found the following very illuminating facts which I am sure will prove of interest to my colleagues of the House. These facts deal with the remarkable growth of the postal business in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and are staggering in their exposition not only of the great responsibilities of the postmasters of the respective cities, but of the tremendous work that is being done by the Postal Service personnel, whom every fair-minded person will admit are notoriously underpaid. Now, then, let us see:

MEMORANDUM

The salary of the postmaster at New York, N. Y., was fixed by a special act of Congress more than 50 years ago.

Comparison

Postal receipts	1875	1927
Receipts	$3,166,946.19	$75,552,970.91
Expenditures	839,445.82	36,249,908.13
Surplus	2,327,500.37	39,303,062.78

Personnel assigned:
Number of employees (approximate)—
1880	1,500
1928	Over 18,000
Stations operated:
1880	19
1928	55

Receipts for the calendar year 1927 approximated the total appropriations made for conducting the entire postal service of the United States at the time the last adjustment of the salary of the postmaster was made.

The volume of business of the New York post office exceeds that of the entire Dominion of Canada.

The volume of business transacted in one month of the present time approximates more than twice the business transacted for the entire year when the salary was first fixed at $8,000 per annum.

The responsibilities of the postmaster increased correspondingly to the increase of the volume of business and the personnel, and was also increased by the introduction of the following additional new activities of the Postal Service:

Postal savings, established January 1, 1912.

Parcel Post Service, inaugurated January 1, 1913.

Government-owned motor-vehicle service added to the postmaster's responsibilities in December, 1917.

Central accounting system in 1920.

Distribution of supplies.

All of these added activities and the growth of the business increased the responsibilities, but no adjustment in salary has been made.

The New York post office has 55 classified stations and 265 contract stations.

Over 18,000 employees are required to man the service.

It receives, delivers, and dispatches 16,000,000 pieces of ordinary mail daily. Receives, delivers, and dispatches 156,000 pieces of registered mail daily. Postal receipts for year ended Dec. 31, 1927	$75,552,970.71
Postal receipts for year ended Dec. 31, 1926	72,686,647.40
Increase 3.93 per cent, or	2,866,323.31

The increase for one year represents more than twice the volume of business transacted in 1875, when the present salary of the postmaster was fixed.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think the salary of these postmasters should be increased?

Mr. O'CONNELL. I am pleading very earnestly for that. I think we ought to adopt the Sproul bill, which would give the postmaster at New York $12,000 a year and pay the postmaster in Brooklyn, who does similarly good work, $10,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Why not make them both the same?

Mr. O'CONNELL. You bet, I will say to my friend from Illinois, I would very much like to give them both the same salary. They are worth it and more besides, as well as Hon. Skidmore Pettit, the efficient and hard-working postmaster at Jamaica, who serves a large part of my district.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Yes; gladly.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not true that while the work has increased enormously, yet the postmaster at New York City and the postmasters in similar cities have been given a great battery of assistant postmasters and clerks, bureau chiefs, and division chiefs, which has very largely reduced the responsibility and the work of the postmasters? Is not that true in all the large cities of the United States?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Oh, no; I will say to my friend that it may reduce their work a little, but it does not reduce in any respect their responsibility. [Applause.]

Now, I must hurry on. There are included within the New York post-office organization five stations whose activities, personnel, and postal receipts equal, or surpass the postal business transacted by many large first-class cities. This may best be indicated by the following summary showing postal receipts for the year 1927, floor space occupied, and personnel assigned:

City Hall Station

Receipts	$10,380,932
Floor space (square feet)	136,130
Personnel (employees)	1,674

Up to 1918 City Hall Station was the general post office.

The receipts are greater than those of Cleveland, Ohio, which is the eighth largest post office in the Postal Service.

Receipts are greater than those of Buffalo, N. Y., and Indianapolis, Ind., combined, and approximate the combined receipts of Toledo, Ohio; Dayton, Ohio; Richmond, Va.; Hartford, Conn.; and Memphis, Tenn.

Grand Central Station

Receipts	$6,540,977
Floor space (square feet)	120,000
Personnel (employees)	2,400

Located, as its name implies, at the terminus of the New York Central and the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad lines, it is a keystone in the New York postal system.

The postal receipts compare favorably with those of Baltimore, Md., and exceed those of Minneapolis, Minn., Washington, D. C., and Milwaukee, Wis.

Hudson Terminal Station

Receipts	$2,456,463
Floor space (square feet)	56,000
Personnel (employees)	1,400

This station is located in the Hudson Terminal Building with direct railway connection with the Pennsylvania lines via the Hudson & Manhattan Railroad.

This station is the distribution center for the down town financial district, and dispatches daily more than a million pieces of first-class mail.

Madison Square Station

Receipts	$5,781,872
Floor space (square feet)	58,000
Personnel (employees)	900

This station is located in the most important commercial and industrial center. The postal receipts exceed those of Milwaukee, Wis.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Atlanta, Ga.; and Dallas, Tex., and are greater than the combined receipts of Louisville, Ky., and New Orleans, La.

Varick Street Station

Receipts	$1,893,027
Floor space (square feet)	163,000
Personnel (employees)	1,100

The receipts are greater than those of Nashville, Tenn., or New Haven, Conn. There is no similar activity of such proportions in the Postal Service. Here are made up all mails intended for foreign countries. Mail is forwarded to Varick Street Station from all parts of the United States, and is distributed for final dispatch to the various countries.

Indicative of the growth in the volume of foreign business handled by the New York post office is the following comparative statement:

Number of sacks dispatched via steamships in 1927	1,557,054
Number of sacks dispatched via steamships in 1917	628,596
Increase of approximately 148 per cent or	928,458

During the period of one week, March 20 to 26, 1927, 32,960 sacks were dispatched to foreign countries via 57 different steamships. During the week of December 4 to 10, 1927, a total of 53,145 sacks were dispatched via 61 different steamships. The weekly average number of sacks dispatched aggregates 20,000, and the average number of steamships via which mail is forwarded weekly totals 56.

The motor-vehicle service requires more than 646 employees to maintain this branch of the service. There is maintained a complete overhaul and repair unit, which also provides mechanical service to 128 other post offices. The local fleet consists of 393 vehicles, which performed service of 3,411,066 miles in 1927.

Besides those units enumerated above, namely, City Hall Station, Grand Central Station, Hudson Terminal Station, Madison Square Station, and Varick Street Station, there are six other stations whose receipts are in excess of $1,000,000 per annum, namely, Trinity Station, Station S, Station A, Station G, and Station P, and five whose receipts range from $2,881,000 to $4,313,076, namely Station D, Station V, West Forty-third Street Station, Wall Street Station, and Times Square Station.

The general post office is the executive and administrative headquarters of this great organization, and houses in addition to mail-handling activities the executive, administrative, and financial sections of the organization. The responsibility of all of these activities rests solely upon the postmaster.

The present postmaster, the Hon. John J. Kiely, is exceptionally well fitted for the position, having come up from the ranks of the service, and through assignment in an official capacity to practically all of the larger units referred to above, secured an experience and training which qualifies him admirably to administer efficiently and economically all of the varied activities of the New York post office.

Turning now to Brooklyn, my home city, which is an independent post office, with, of course, its own postmaster, the Hon. Albert Firmin, we find that Congress passed an act June 5, 1920, which fixed the salaries of all postmasters in first, second, and third class post offices; and while the postmasters of all the second and third class offices, and of some of the first-class offices received an increase of about $200 each, the offices with receipts in excess of $600,000 were not affected, except that an additional grade was provided for offices with receipts of $7,000,000 and in excess of this sum, with compensation at $8,000.

Again there was legislation in 1925, when Congress, upon February 28, 1925, gave some small increases to postmasters of the third class and to a few grades in the second class. The compensation of postmasters of large offices like New York and Brooklyn were not, however, increased.

The receipts of the Brooklyn post office last year were $9,140,807.15. Brooklyn now ranks next to Chicago as to its population. Brooklyn is in fact the seventh city in the world as to population. It is credited by the Census Bureau in its estimate of July 1, 1927, with 2,274,400 people, or 459,000 more than Manhattan. The Brooklyn City post office also serves a section of Queens County, with possibly 100,000 additional patrons, and from these statistics you will perceive the transcendent importance of this great center of population over our other great cities. It is the most populous of all the boroughs making up New York City. Furthermore, it is growing with phenomenal speed. In excess of $600,000 each working day is being expended at the present time for new buildings and alterations on old ones, and you can well perceive the burden this rapid development places upon the postal organization and how it adds to the responsibilities of the postmaster.

I have mentioned that the receipts of the Brooklyn office during the year just passed amounted to $9,140,807, but this big sum by no means represents the full financial responsibility of the postmaster, and for which full responsibility he is bonded. The money-order transactions of the Brooklyn office I find, for instance, amounted last year to $59,029,187, and it has $6,299,666 on deposit in the postal savings.

I do not believe that there are any other industrial organizations in our Commonwealth with transactions of comparable volume and employing executives with comparable responsibilities which are paying so little. In our great industrial and financial institutions, few among which employ so many men or handle such large sums, it will be found that minor executives are paid more than we are paying these chief executives.

Contrasting the salaries of our postmasters in large post offices of the United States, the maximum grade of which is $8,000, with the salaries paid in New York to our city officials—and I do not doubt but a similar comparison with other cities would produce like results—we find that the postmasters are sorely discriminated against. Our city pays the dock commissioner $10,000; the chief civil-service commissioner, $8,500; commissioner of correction, $10,000; commissioner of accounts, $10,000; commissioner of water supply, $10,000; commissioner of health, $10,000; commissioner of markets, $10,000; director of budget, $12,000; and secretary to the mayor, $8,500.

I should add that while the duty of Congress is to fix compensation commensurate with the responsibility of the office—and it is the duty of the Executive to see that the positions are filled by those who measure up to the importance of the offices created—it is nevertheless of interest when we are discussing the problems involved to know that the present incumbents of these two offices are men who entered the service more than 40 years ago, starting at the lowest rungs of the postal ladder, and that they have as a result of assiduous application to duty, exemplary industry, and acknowledged efficiency climbed to the top. It is equally interesting to know that many other postmasters among those who would be benefited by this bill, in some of the chief offices of the United States, have likewise very fine records of the same kind, as, for instance, the postmaster at Philadelphia and Detroit.

In closing I would add that the Postal Service is one of the chief industries of the Nation. Upon its efficient management both our social and industrial relations and communications are very largely dependent. Any breakdown in the postal system would result in the paralysis of the country. Such men as I have referred to have devoted their lives to this business, which is our business, and it is a specialized work, so that if they abandon it they have no other market in which to offer the knowledge which they have acquired.

Under these circumstances and in view of the other facts submitted, it is only common justice to compensate them fairly for their services.

So long as the salaries fixed in 1875 and on these other remote dates I have named remain unchanged we are subject to grave reproach for permitting it. [Applause.]

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, after the illuminating address of my distinguished colleague from New York, I feel it is only proper and right that somebody from the city of New York and the Borough of Manhattan should say a word on behalf of the post office and the present incumbent of that office, and let the splendid work that is being done there be known throughout the country.

The present postmaster of the Borough of Manhattan of the city of New York is not of my political affiliation, but he is a gentleman who has administered the affairs of the post office for the past four and a half or five years and has brought it to the wonderful level it has now attained.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations asked my colleague if he wanted to raise this salary. I want to indorse with all the strength at my command the suggestion that his salary be raised, because Mr. John J. Kiely, now in active control of 18,000 men in the Post Office Department, an army in and of itself, where the distribution of mail is done in the most efficient manner known throughout the United States, should receive a salary commensurate with a man who commands an army or a man who commands a division of 18,000 men in the city of New York or anywhere throughout the United States. To say that this man should be kept at the present salary of $8,000 a year, when he has been a postman all his life and a postmaster for the past four and a half or five years, is ridiculous.

I understand nothing can be done in this bill with reference to this particular salary, but the Sproul bill will accomplish what is sought to be done with respect to this matter.

Under the administration of Mr. Kiely pneumatic tubes have been placed throughout the city of New York and Brooklyn, and it is possible now to deliver a letter within the city of New York and within the Borough of Manhattan in a matter of two or three hours.

The time has come when we should recognize such efficient work, and we must recognize efficiency irrespective of party and irrespective of any other consideration. A man who is doing his work as splendidly as Mr. Kiely is in New York should receive recognition and his salary should be advanced. He should receive at least the sum of $12,000 a year, and I will support the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPROUL] which contemplates such an increase. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For the inland transportation of mail by aircraft, under contract, and for the incidental expenses thereof including not to exceed $30,000 for assistant superintendents and clerks at air mail transfer points, in accordance with the act approved February 2, 1925, and amended June 3, 1926, $6,430,000: Provided, That $19,100 of this appropriation shall be available for the payment for personal services in the District of Columbia, incidental and travel expenses.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the contracts for air mail meet the probable developments of the air mail service in the coming fiscal year, and will the appropriation provide for a reasonable expansion of that service?

Mr. MADDEN. There is $6,430,000 in this item. In addition to that there is an appropriation in the Department of Commerce appropriation bill for the development of airways, lighting, and so forth. There are 11,700 miles of air mail routes under contract; they are not all in operation and will not all be in operation until about the 1st of July.

The sum of $6,000,000 was asked in the Budget for carrying air mail by contract. The committee thought they ought to have some leeway, and so we added $430,000. I believe the department is satisfied.

The committee thinks that there ought to be great care exercised in the letting of contracts for air mail. They ought to be sure that there is air mail to be carried over the routes for which the contract is let. Otherwise you are not going to be able to get contractors. We are depending now on private citizens to bid for it, either as individuals or as members of corporations. It would be most unfortunate, it seems to the committee, if we should let contracts for air mail routes that turned out to be unprofitable.

Mr. BRIGGS. The committee, I understand, has the thought that in taking these contracts the contractor must be able to make a reasonable return. Otherwise there would not be sufficient interest in the service on the part of the contractor.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and we ought not to expand until we are reasonably certain of success.

Mr. BRIGGS. Except where they are an integral part of the air mail service throughout the country.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; there is money enough in the fund to meet any such emergency.

Mr. BRIGGS. In the contemplated reduction in the Air Mail Service from 10 cents to 5 cents a half ounce, does the gentleman expect an increase in revenue from that reduction?

Mr. MADDEN. The committee does.

Mr. BRIGGS. My own thought is that it will produce an increase in revenue.

Mr. MADDEN. It should, but experience has shown that whether rates will bring an increase in revenue is uncertain. Nobody can tell. The best test we had on a comparison of receipts and expenditures was for seven days last October, when the deficit was shown to be about $850,000 on a yearly basis, but since that time there has been some growth. There was nothing included in that loss for the lighting of the airways which would add to the loss. But the air service is growing.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois stated in his opening speech that there were about six air mail routes showing a profit.

Mr. MADDEN. We were told that, but it is a question of how they keep their books, whether they charge off depreciation or whether they just balance receipts and expenses without any charge for depreciation.

Mr. BRIGGS. But the gentleman thinks there is a growing improvement?

Mr. MADDEN. There is a growing improvement, and it is encouraging.

Mr. BRIGGS. And the gentleman thinks that the reduction to 5 cents a half ounce will improve matters in revenue?

Mr. MADDEN. There is one thing that everybody ought to realize, and that is the Air Mail Service is not going to be self-sustaining without the cooperation of the public.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a statement of the contract Air Mail Service and the poundage rate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL

For manufacture of adhesive postage stamps, special-delivery stamps, books of stamps, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, postal cards, and for coiling of stamps, $7,950,000.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Under what arrangement does the Government procure printed stamped envelopes?

Mr. MADDEN. The Government has a contract for printing stamped envelopes, which will expire next year. I think not more than $30,000 on a whole year's supply.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the Government entering into any activity that is not a necessary function of Government.

This appropriation is necessary to fulfill the Government's annual payment under its four-year contract for stamped envelopes with return notice, and so forth. I do not oppose this appropriation for the sole reason that I want the Government to live up to its contract, but I am opposed to the renewal of that contract when it expires and serve notice that I shall fight any extension as unwise in principle.

There is no reason for the Government to appropriate money to carry on any business that is not a necessary function of government. I am opposed to any appropriation to permit the Government to go into either the printing or the stationery business. The statement is made, and perhaps it is correct, that by this method the users of this character of printed stationery may acquire it cheaper than from private sources. It is also stated that this will therefore benefit a large number of people and adversely affect only a few. This statement is also no doubt true. Yet, conceding the truth of both statements, are we justified in this intrusion of the Government into a legitimate field of private business which is not a necessary function of government?

I have received many letters from my district which are inspired by the chamber of commerce of the city (Dayton, Ohio) which has the monopoly of doing this printing for the Government. This fact is not disclosed in the letters. These letter writers all favor the continuance of the custom. One of these letters to me is from a shoe merchant in my district, who says that he can buy his stationery much cheaper this way, and if the Government did not do this work only a few printers would be benefited thereby. I concede this also to be true, yet still is it wise for the Government to do this printing?

Is it not the purpose of government to protect the rights of the few as well as the rights of the many? I suggested to the shoe merchant that if the Government went into the shoe business and manufactured millions of pairs of shoes it would probably furnish them to the wearers of shoes cheaper than they are now buying them, and only a few shoe merchants would suffer therefrom. This also would apply with equal force to countless other phases of private business, and if for that reason alone the Government did invade many fields of private business the final result would be that there would be no business outside of the Government.

Regardless of the great number benefited and the small number prejudiced, I see no more reason for the Government to go into the stationery and printing business than into the shoe business or any other unnecessary business. I am therefore opposed to the principle of appropriating for this activity.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of rural carriers, auxiliary carriers, substitutes for rural carriers on annual and sick leave, clerks in charge of rural stations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, and for the incidental expenses thereof, $106,000,000.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is the appropriation provided here for rural carrier service adequate to meet all demands?

Mr. MADDEN. The appropriation is $106,000,000. There are 38 applications pending for new routes. They will all be adjudicated and most of them, I presume, will be put into service. There are about 1,100 applications for changes in existing routes and all of those will be adjusted. There never has been a better situation in respect to the rural service than that which exists to-day. They have plenty of money here, every one admits, with no piling up of applications that are undisposed of.

Mr. BRIGGS. And this provides for a reasonable expansion of that service?

Mr. MADDEN. It provides for all of the expansion requested.

Mr. BRIGGS. Some will come in with the current fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. And this provides for meeting that situation as well as for pending applications?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And the Post Office Department, especially the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, will not be able to answer that it can not furnish new service where it is needed because it has not the money.

Mr. MADDEN. It will not be justified in making that excuse.

Mr. BLANTON. Because the committee has given it all it requested along that line?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Those civilian positions in the field services under the several executive departments and independent establishments, the compensation of which was fixed or limited by law but adjusted for the fiscal year 1925 under the authority and appropriations contained in the act entitled "An act making additional appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, to enable the heads of the several executive departments and independent establishments to adjust the rates of compensation of civilian employees in certain of the field services," approved December 6, 1924, may be paid under the applicable appropriations for the fiscal year 1929 at rates not in excess of those permitted for them under the provisions of such act of December 6, 1924.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 81, line 24, after the figures "1929," insert "and thereafter."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about what this means, I wish to say that we have carried this language for years. It is necessary from year to year. What this language proposes is now being done, and if this amendment is adopted we will not be required to carry the language in the future, because it will then be permanent law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The head of an executive department or independent establishment, where, in his judgment, conditions of employment require it, may continue to furnish civilians employed in the field service with quarters, heat, light, household equipment, subsistence, and laundry service; and appropriations for the fiscal year 1929 of the character heretofore used for such purposes are hereby made available therefore: Provided, That the reasonable value of such allowances shall be determined and considered as part of the compensation in fixing the salary rate of such civilians.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "therefore," in line 10, on page 82, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have a further amendment, which I desire to offer on that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 82, line 8, after the figures "1929," insert "and thereafter."

Mr. MADDEN. This is similar to the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MICHENER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10635) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. When is the proper time to move to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. After the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on ordering the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 324, nays 10, not voting 99, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LINTHICUM moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to forthwith report the same back to the House with the following amendment: Add to the end of the bill the following as a new section:

"That no money herein appropriated for the enforcement of the national prohibition act shall be used in the preparation or issue of any permit for the removal or use of any industrial alcohol known to be denatured by any deadly poisonous drug."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the motion to recommit, that it is legislation sought to be placed without authority on an appropriation bill, in that it seeks to change the existing law, the law having been for the past 25 years that permits can be issued to remove such alcohol where it contains poisonous substances; and it seeks also to interfere with the discretion of executive officers in the performance of their duty.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to inquire if this is the same amendment that was offered yesterday?

Mr. BLANTON. Either the same or it substantially. Mr. Speaker GILLETT in several instances corrected wrong rulings that were inadvertently made in Committee of the Whole. I call the attention of the Chair to one in particular where Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole had held for many years that the garden-seed provision on an appropriation bill was in order; and yet, when the matter came up before the Speaker the Speaker stated that, although that holding had been held in the Committee of the Whole repeatedly, he felt it his duty to exercise proper consideration of the question, and that if he could not agree with the position of the Chairman of the committee, he was constrained not to follow it. And he sustained the point of order. I am appealing now to the judgment of the present Speaker of the House. This is a change of law, and an interference with the proper discretion that an executive officer should have in the performance of his duty.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not present yesterday when this question was ruled on in Committee of the Whole, but the Chair understands that the amendment is practically the same. The Chair has read the debate and read the decision of the Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], and thinks that the decision was quite correct. He therefore overrules the point of order. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that, in the opinion of the Chair, the ayes have it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland demands a division.

Mr. CAREW. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Sixty-eight Members have risen—a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are ordered. As many as are in favor of the motion to recommit will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 61, nays 283, not voting 89, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE LATE STANYARNE WILSON

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that on yesterday, at Spartanburg, S. C., Hon. Stanyarne Wilson, a Member of this House for six years from the fourth South Carolina district, died.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the order of business for to-morrow will be the Underhill general claims bill, which is the unfinished business on the calendar. The District appropriation bill is not ready for consideration to-morrow, and as the unfinished business on the calendar is the general claims bill, it will go on to-morrow.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There is some notion that other bills reported by the Claims Committee may come up to-morrow. Is that so?

Mr. TILSON. It is not the intention to take up the Private Calendar.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE TUG FORK OF BIG SANDY RIVER

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call up Senate bill 2348, now on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up a Senate bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 2348) granting the consent of Congress to the Norfolk & Western Railway Co. and Knox Creek Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate two bridges across the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River, near Devon, Mingo County, W. Va.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, in this connection I would like to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the Speaker. It is the same inquiry I submitted yesterday afternoon to the Acting Speaker [Mr. TILSON]. When a Senate bill has been passed by the Senate and is messaged over to the House and is lying on the Speaker's table, and a similar bill, or a bill substantially similar, has been reported by a House committee, it is proper under the rules to move to take the Senate bill from the Speaker's table and consider it in the House. The question I wish to present is, does the same rule apply where the House bill has not only been reported by the House committee but has been passed by the House and sent over to the Senate? When I propounded my inquiry yesterday afternoon there was some discussion about the matter, and there appeared quite a difference of opinion respecting it among several of our best parliamentarians, although the Acting Speaker [Mr. TILSON] seemed to be practically sure that the rule would apply in such a case just the same as if the House bill had been reported but not passed. I would like to present that inquiry to the Speaker before this bill is acted upon, in order that there may be a ruling of the present Speaker and the question may be definitely settled for the guidance of Members when similar questions hereafter arise.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has read the debate on that question, not being present yesterday. The Chair remembers that a short time ago the present occupant of the chair was about to make a ruling on the subject sustaining the right to call up a bill under these circumstances. However, at that time the gentleman calling up the bill changed his request to one of unanimous consent, so it was not necessary for the Chair to pass directly upon the question. The Chair, however, has before him a precisely similar situation which developed in the third session of the Sixty-second Congress, where a question arose as to whether a Senate bill could be called up as a matter of right when a similar House bill had been passed. Speaker Clark, in ruling on that question, decided, in substance, that the situation, in so far as the House bill was concerned, was the same whether it had been merely reported or had actually passed. Speaker Clark held that the same rule applied, and the present occupant of the chair, having been of that opinion hitherto and being reinforced by this ruling of Speaker Clark, has no hesitation in ruling that such a bill may be called up as a matter of right.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has formally authorized me to make this motion, and therefore I renew the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be proper, under the circumstances, to request the Senate to return the House bill. That was done in this previous case.

Mr. DENISON. I was either going to do that, Mr. Speaker, or request them to table it or postpone its consideration indefinitely.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will take charge of that.

Mr. DENISON. Yes; I will attend to that.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. QUAYLE, for an indefinite period, on account of undergoing an operation in a Brooklyn hospital.

Mr. GIBSON, for five days, on account of important business.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for my colleague the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCMILLAN], on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request is granted.

There was no objection.

THE VOLSTEAD ACT

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent yesterday, and therefore I have to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of poisoned whisky.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, are these remarks a post-mortem?

Mr. BERGER. A post-mortem about the gentleman, because I consider him "poisoned." [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I have introduced a bill to legalize the manufacture and sale of light wines and beers.

Now, let me define, first, what is understood by light wines. Light wines are those containing 12 per cent or less of alcohol. And beer is the usual beverage of barley and hops with an alcoholic content of 4 per cent or less.

VOLSTEAD LAW IS MAKING OUR NATION A "HARD-LIQUOR" NATION

My reason for introducing that bill, above all, is the fact that the Volstead Act is arbitrary, unscientific, and nonsensical, and that it can not be effectively enforced under present conditions.

Furthermore, also, that the eight years of attempted enforcement of the Volstead Act have brought about disastrous consequences to the morale of our country. During these eight years crime has increased and drunkenness has increased. The reason for that is simple. Beer and light wines can not be obtained readily, but one can get whisky. People bought and used whisky which they got from bootleggers.

The kind of whisky people can get, however, is inferior and harmful and instills poisons in hundreds of thousands of our people, especially, also, of our young people.

Since we have prohibition our Nation has not only become a Nation of home-brewers, making inferior beer to take the place of the good old beer that we had in the past, but, what is worse, our people drink again "hard liquor." And that is a great pity, since in 1917 we were just on the point of getting used to light wines and beers.

CREATING "LAW JAMS"

One of the worst aspects of the Volstead Act is that violations of law have ceased to be regarded as crimes. Violations are so common that the Federal courts are congested with liquor cases. The beginning of 1928 has seen one of the worst law jams and court congestions in the history of the country.

Prohibition cases are chiefly responsible for that. At the present time criminal litigation alone, based on violations of the Volstead Act, represent more than 50 per cent of all the criminal litigation in the Federal courts.

And another feature of this is that fully 15,000 dry cases must be nolle prossed by Federal district attorneys because the Government's evidence has collapsed.

I shall submit a table showing the record, by years, of Volstead law arrests and prosecutions, which will give a view of court congestion.

SPYING IS A JOB NEITHER DECENT NOR HONORABLE

And since the Volstead Act is a bad act, it naturally needs "bad actors" to enforce it.

When prohibition was getting under way a suggestion was made in Congress to select all the agents by civil service. The late Wayne B. Wheeler, however, objected strenuously. He and his Anti-Saloon crowd wanted a hand-picked crew—and having full sway in Congress—Congress let Wayne B. Wheeler have his way.

The result was a bad failure. Therefore lately the Anti-Saloon League began to clamor for a civil-service examination, which the old force had also to undergo. And although the test was not scholastic and had nothing to do with book learning—and the questions were very simple, practical questions—75 per cent of the present 2,000 supervisors, inspectors, and agents of the Federal prohibition enforcers were unable to pass the examination.

The failure of these men to pass so simple an examination caused considerable comment all over the country.

But that result can also be explained very readily.

The service under the Volstead Act is one which in the main appeals only to persons of a low grade of intelligence or those who can not find any other jobs. "High-brow" prohibition agents—which in this case would mean prohibition agents who can read and use common, everyday intelligence—would perhaps be all right if the job they were called upon to do was either decent or honorable.

CELLAR SNOOPER KNOWS LESS THAN EIGHTH-GRADE BOY

As everyone knows, however, the prohibition agent, with few exceptions, is rarely asked to do anything that is decent or honorable. Most of his time he is supposed to spend snooping on his neighbors and otherwise make a nuisance of himself. And not a small part of his time he must spend making a hash of the spirit, if not of the letter, of the Constitution of the United States under the pretext of enforcing the eighteenth amendment.

And thus the Prohibition Bureau begot a crowd three-quarters of which could not pass an examination, which any boy or girl who has finished the eighth grade in a public school would easily pass. Out of a force of 2,000 men three-quarters of those spies and cellar snoopers failed to qualify in that examination.

So much for this side of the question.

PLEASE LOOK AT THE MONEY SPENT

But now as to the other side.

National prohibition finished the eighth year of its existence on January 16, 1928.

The financial outlay by the Federal Government for the enforcement of this act during the eight years follows:

Prohibition Unit	$75,716,860
Coast Guard, approximate	70,000,000
Department of Justice, approximate	32,000,000
Total	177,716,860

Nor is that all.

AND LOOK AT THE INCOME LOST

There has been, on the other hand, a definite loss in revenues that the Government derived from spirits and beers. These amounted to $483,050,854.47 in 1919 and $443,389,544.98 in 1918.

In the eight years before 1918 the internal-revenue receipts from these sources were:

1910	$201,008,670.88
1911	211,804,579.55
1912	212,042,339.92
1913	223,314,452.21
1914	226,179,689.76
1915	223,948,646.09
1916	247,453,543.52
1917	284,008,512.62

This was an increase from 1910 to 1917 of more than $80,000,000 in annual receipts. Discounting the two abnormal years of taxes collected and assuming that the eight years from 1920 to 1928 would have seen a like increase in these revenues, the total that might now be expected if prohibition had not come would be close to $350,000,000 or more a year.

FIGURES PROVING DRUNKENNESS STEADILY ON THE INCREASE

And the most significant result is that drunkenness has increased continuously.

Drunkenness increased almost as fast in 1926 as it did in 1925 and somewhat faster than it did in 1924.

The 602 cities and towns reporting arrests for drunkenness showed an increase from 650,961 in 1924 to 687,812 in 1925 and 711,889 in 1926. I have no figures for 1927 as yet.

In 534 cities and towns arrests for drunkenness in 1926 increased 136 per cent above 1920—above the first year of national prohibition.

In 403 cities and towns reporting for 1914 to 1926, arrests for drunkenness in 1926 were higher than in any previous year with the one exception of the war-boom peak of 1916. The 1916 peak was 563,792 for drunkenness, and 1926 almost reached that peak year, being 559,074.

MORE DRUNKENNESS IN THE NATIONAL CAPITAL THAN EVER

Intoxication in Washington, the National Capital, has apparently risen to new high altitudes. At any rate, all previous records for commitments to the District of Columbia Jail for intoxication were shattered in the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1927, according to the annual report of the superintendent of the institution submitted to the District of Columbia Commissioners. The largest total commitment for a single offense in the year was for intoxication.

The report pointed out that intoxication accounted for 49.2 per cent of the total for all offenses for which prisoners were committed to the jail, and that the intoxication cases, which numbered 5,874, exceeded by 820 the number of prisoners sent to jail for the same offense in the preceding year.

Conditions in the former so-called dry States are very much worse to-day as compared with 1914 than are conditions in the so-called wet States. In the dry States the number of arrests for drunkenness went up sharply in 1926 and exceeded any year heretofore.

REPORT OF FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES ON DRINKING AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE

But the most distressing result of the Volstead Act has been the increase in drinking among boys and girls and young people generally. There have been reports to this effect in the press so constantly from all over the United States that the matter has become common knowledge.

The Federal Council of Churches in its investigation of the subject sent questionnaires to 2,700 social workers, who, as a class, are prejudiced in favor of prohibition. Yet the great majority of the replies received stated that they observed more drinking by young people than in preprohibition times. Sheriffs and chiefs of police of towns and district attorneys give similar testimony.

The attorney general of South Dakota, a dry State before prohibition, said:

> There is a strange psychology about this liquor problem that makes it doubly significant. It is beginning to affect a different type of persons than it did before. Now it is the youngster of the family of means who is toting the bottle. The boy thinks it is smart to have a bottle on the hip, and the girls encourage the boys to do it. And they rush about in cars. It is one of the most menacing phases of the whole situation.

RAISING A NEW CROP OF DRUNKARDS

While there is not much authoritative statistics as yet upon the subject of drunkenness among the young, apparently the largest increase has taken place among those from 15 to 25 years of age.

The Police Department of Washington, D. C., has classified the arrests for drunkenness by ages, and its figures are illuminating. These official figures completely confirm the other evidence on the subject as to the Nation on the whole and leave no doubt that there has been a very considerable increase in drunkenness among the young. This can only mean that each year we are raising a new crop of drunkards which is much larger than the annual crop we used to raise under the saloon.

ABANDON ALL HOPE OF BENEFIT FROM VOLSTEAD ACT

When we also consider that drunkenness generally has already increased to the preprohibition level, and that drunken children have increased far above what was ever known to be before in our country, we can not escape the conclusion that the Volstead Act is an absolute failure—that it surely has not promoted temperance and sobriety.

Moreover, since conditions have become worse, not better, each year since we have prohibition, and with the "next generation" drinking as never before, there seems to be no hope that the Volstead Act can ever accomplish its purpose.

So much for the effect of prohibition and the Volstead Act on the young folks.

DEATHS FROM ALCOHOLISM ON THE INCREASE

But what about the injury wrought by the bootlegger, moonshine, and poison whisky on adults?

We happen to have some statistics on that question.

Figures obtained by the New York World from the United States Census Bureau indicate that the mounting death rate from alcohol, on which the attention of the country was focused sharply at the national convention of State public-health officials held in Washington May, 1927, has not been checked.

Statistics up to December 31, 1926, have been completed for the United States registration area.

They show a picture even more dismal than that unfolded in Washington. There were 4,109 deaths from alcoholism in the United States registration area, which covers nearly all the States, in the last year for which records are available. There were, in addition, 7,591 deaths from cirrhosis—hardening—of the liver, a disease which physicians ordinarily attribute to alcohol.

Starting with 1920, when the reaction from prohibition began to set in, there has been a steadily mounting tide of deaths from these two causes. In virtually every State in the Union, whether known as wet or dry, the percentages have been mounting. There is a general agreement among experts who have studied the subject that the enormous increase in deaths is to be attributed quite as much to the quality of the liquor obtainable as it is to the quantity.

In 1920, two years after the eighteenth amendment was adopted, only 20 persons were recorded in Chicago as dying from alcoholism. In 1927 there were 340 such deaths, an increase of 1,600 per cent for the eight-year period.

Detailed figures showing that the bootlegger is far more deadly than the preprohibition saloonkeeper in his heydey were made public in New York at the bureau of vital statistics of the department of health. The death rate from alcoholism for 1927 is 13 per 100,000, or slightly more than the rate for measles in peak years.

BOOTLEGGER FAR MORE DEADLY THAN SALOONKEEPER IN HIS HEYDEY

The figures reveal a startling rise beginning in 1921 and continuing year after year until in 1927 all records for the deadly effects of alcohol, good or bad, are smashed. The 1927 total is, so far as can be learned, the greatest in the history of the city.

The Chicago (Ill.) Journal of January 5 says:

> This editorial writes itself. The coroner reports that in 1927 there were in Cook County 433 deaths caused wholly by alcoholism and 161 homicides and deaths by accident clearly due to alcohol. The total, 594, is the ghastly record for 12 months of the Anti-Saloon League and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union brand of prohibition. The number of deaths due to alcoholism is mounting steadily year by year. The "drys" will chant songs in praise of the holy eighteenth amendment and the sacred Volstead Act, but the cemeteries are filling up.

IF MY BILL BECAME LAW IT WOULD PREVENT MURDER AND PROMOTE TEMPERANCE

The country evidently can not go on like this.

That is why I introduced my bill to permit the manufacture, sale, and use of light wines and beer.

I am of the firm conviction that if my bill becomes a law—and the Volstead Act is amended accordingly, and also accompanied by suitable revenue legislation—that we would eliminate all the evil effects of the present method of enforcing the eighteenth amendment. And we would also obtain what the eighteenth amendment was passed for—a greater degree of temperance.

My bill, should it become a law, would stop the growth of the bootlegging industry, check disrespect for the Constitution, eliminate scandalous corruption, and prevent murder by poison whisky. And in addition it would produce a handsome revenue which could be used for beneficial purposes.

WILL ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE PERMIT OLD PARTIES TO ACCEPT IT?

Let us hope that the Anti-Saloon League—which absolutely controls both the Republican and Democratic Parties in Congress—will permit the committee to report out my bill.

I submit herewith a table showing the number of arrests for intoxication year by year:

SENATE

THURSDAY, February 16, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and everlasting God, our Heavenly Father, who hast led us through storm and sunshine, bringing us in safety to the beginning of this day, let Thy love and patience be shown forth in our lives and conversation, Thy tenderness and compassion in our words and actions. For the duties of this day strengthen us with blessings from on high, that through Thine own enabling power whatever of good has been cast down may be raised up, whatever of truth has grown old may be made new, and that all things may advance unto perfection, when the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ, and He shall reign forever and ever. Amen.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, last summer from August 25 to 30 there was held in the city of Paris, France, the annual meeting of the Interparliamentary Union.

As is well known the Interparliamentary Union is composed of groups of practically all the various nations of the world, and the American group which attended the meeting of the union last year in Paris was composed of a considerable number of Senators and Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

While the Interparliamentary Union is not an official body, at the same time it is composed of men and women, all of whom are members of the parliaments of the various countries.

The Congress of the United States contributes to the expense of the Interparliamentary Union about $6,000 per year for the purpose of maintaining it.

The sessions of the union are held in the various capitals of the world annually and have been the means of bringing together distinguished men and women representing the various governments and for the purpose of considering matters which are of great interest to all the countries of the world.

It has been the custom to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the report of the proceedings of the meetings of the Interparliamentary Union, made by the secretary. The late Senator McKinley, of Illinois, who was formerly the president of the American group, always had these proceedings placed in the Senate RECORD.

I had the honor of being a member of the American group last year and attended the sessions of the union in Paris. I found the sessions of very great interest, and I think of very great value to the countries represented.

The sessions were held in the senate chamber of the Luxemburg Palace, Paris, and every courtesy and consideration was given to the members of the union by the Government of France.

The President of France himself was greatly interested and was present on one or two occasions when the union was in session. The president of the Senate of France presided over the sessions of the union, and the attendance from the 33 countries of the world represented was composed of men of the highest importance in their country; premiers, foreign ministers, and many others being present, and especially imposing were the delegations from France, Germany, Great Britain, Poland, and Czechoslovakia.

Many vital questions of the day were discussed, including disarmament, codification of international laws, customs agreements among the nations of Europe, and the regulation of the sale of opium, and while, of course, no official action could be taken, due to the unofficial character of the assembly, at the same time the complete discussion of every subject resulted in resolutions being passed at the conclusion of the conference upon many subjects which will have, in all probability, a far-reaching influence in the various countries represented.

I believe, Mr. President, it will be of interest to the Members of Congress and to those who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to be informed as to just what transpired at this last session of the Interparliamentary Union. The president of the American group is an honored former Member of this body, ex-Senator THEODORE E. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent that the report of the secretary of the Interparliamentary Union be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Tennessee how much space will be occupied by the insertion in the RECORD of the matter to which he refers?

Mr. FLETCHER. How voluminous is it?

Mr. TYSON. It is just an ordinary document, being merely a résumé of the proceedings, covering perhaps a page and a half or two pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought the Senator desired that all of the addresses made should be printed in the RECORD, and that would occupy too much space.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Tennessee is granted.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, the matter submitted and ordered to be printed in the RECORD is as follows:

THE AMERICAN GROUP OF THE INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

STATEMENT OF THE EXECUTIVE SECRETARY

Pursuant to Article VI of the by-laws, the twenty-fifth annual meeting of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union will be held in the Committee on Naval Affairs room of the House Office Building Friday, February 24, 1928, at 10.30 o'clock a. m. In the light of this fact the following information will be of interest to the Congress:

ART. X. These by-laws may be amended, after notice previously given, by a majority vote of the members present at any meeting regularly called for that purpose, or at any annual meeting. A copy of the proposed amendment shall accompany the notice of any meeting called for the purpose of amending the by-laws, and no other amendment than the one thus proposed shall be considered at any meeting thus called or at any annual meeting.

MINUTES OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL MEETING, FEBRUARY 24, 1927

The twenty-fourth annual meeting of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union was held in the room of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives February 24, 1927, at 10.30 o'clock a. m. The meeting was called to order by Representative ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, senior vice president of the group.

The executive secretary submitted his report, as follows:

"The facts of major interest during the year 1926–27, in the order of their importance to the group, are the death of Senator William B. McKinley, the meeting of the six commissions in Geneva, an invitation from the French group, and the matter of finance.

"Senator William B. McKinley, of Illinois, president of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union, beginning 1919, died at Home Lawn Sanatorium, Martinsville, Ind., December 27, 1926. Memorial services were held in the House of Representatives Sunday, February 6, 1927, where addresses were made by Representatives MADDEN, BRITTEN, DENISON, ADKINS, BARKLEY, BURTON, MONTAGUE, HULL, CONNALLY, CHINDBLOM, ARNOLD, YATES, SABATH, RATHBONE, and MCKEOWN. (February 27 similar services were held in the Senate, where addresses were delivered by Senators DENEEN, WARREN, CAPPER, HARRIS, and ROBINSON.) Many letters and telegrams have been received from various groups and officials of the Interparliamentary Union, all of which will appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and in the memorial volume to be published by Congress. The day following Senator McKinley's death the group adopted resolutions, which were sent to the Senator's relatives in Champaign, Ill.

"The Interparliamentary Union has six study commissions, as follows: (1) Commission pour l'etude des Questions Economiques et Financieres; (2) Commission pour l'etude des Questions Ethniques et Coloniales; (3) Commission pour l'etude des Questions Juridiques; (4) Commission pour l'etude des Questions Politiques et D'organisation; (5) Commission pour l'etude de la Question de la Reduction des Armements; (6) Commission pour l'etude des Questions Sociales et Humanitaires. These commissions met in Geneva August 26 to September 1, 1926. Delegates representing the American group at these meetings were Representative BURTON, Senator SWANSON, Representative PORTER, Senator PAT HARRISON, and Senator T. H. CARAWAY. The executive secretary was present. Representative BRITTEN was at the time in Europe, but because of ill health he was unable to get to Geneva.

"The invitation from the French group to attend the twenty-fourth conference of the Interparliamentary Union in Paris, August, 1927, was read.

"The executive secretary's statement relative to the finances of the group follows:

"'The finances of our American group of the Interparliamentary Union are, as usual, in an unhappy condition. This is an unfortunate fact, due undoubtedly to want of attention by members of the group. Congress appropriates $6,000 a year for the maintenance of the Interparliamentary Union, but none of this money is available for the purposes of the American group. In short, the American group of the Interparliamentary Union has no visible means of support. There is no provision for dues or assessment. There is no aid from Congress. The work of the group moves along as best it can. It is true that the group has for a number of years been the recipient of charity. Various people have helped financially. Senator McKinley paid many bills out of his own pocket. Our treasurer, too, has from time to time eased the situation from his own funds. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace has kindly contributed funds for a number of years. The American Peace Society has helped. Generous as these acts are, they ought not to be necessary. Your executive secretary asks no pay for his services. He accepted the duties of his office some 9 or 10 years ago because he was asked and because he felt since his own work has to do with matters affecting international understanding, that the Interparliamentary Union offers practical means of helping in that business worthily. He has enjoyed the work immensely. It is true Senator McKinley thought that the executive secretary ought to receive something at least toward his expenses, whereupon, after correspondence with the president of the Carnegie Endowment, he allotted $600, which he insisted your executive secretary should take for the year ending February 24, 1926, and urged that that amount, regularly granted for a number of years to Dr. S. B. North, Mr. Call's predecessor, should be similarly allotted to the present executive secretary.'

"The labors of this organization have in years past been worth while. They are worth while now. What the future of the group will be, especially during the coming decade, depends, of course, upon the tasks it sets for itself to perform. The group will wish to be reminded that it has not only sent delegates to international conferences of the union, it has stood for definite matters, the principles of arbitration, the codification and extension of international law, the processes of international justice, and kindred things.

"Your executive secretary has been forced since Senator McKinley's death to handle certain moneys. The Senator's executor has sent a statement of the finances of the conference of 1925 and of our group. Your executive secretary asks, therefore, that you appoint a committee to audit all of the accounts, his own included, and to appoint a committee for that purpose.

"Upon motion of Mr. BRITTEN it was voted to appoint such a committee.

"Upon motion of Mr. MCSWAIN, it was voted to accept and file the report of the executive secretary.

"Mr. BURTON reported the work of the council and of the study commissions of the Interparliamentary Union in Geneva for the week August 26 to September 1, inclusive. He pointed out that some 21 countries were represented. The proposal that all future meetings of the Interparliamentary Union be held at Geneva failed. There were lengthy discussions relative to the alleged decadence of interparliamentary bodies. Whether or not the Spanish language should be added to the three official languages of the conference, French, German, and English, was discussed and denied, but with the understanding that in case there is a sufficiently large representation of Spanish-speaking countries at any conference, the Spanish language may be used in addition to those already employed. No little attention was paid to the further codification of international law. There were discussions on the criminality of wars of aggression. Discussion of tariff regulations was limited to European countries. The rights of minorities and problems incident to the reduction of arms were discussed at considerable length. Mr. BURTON called especial attention to the debates relative to opium and poisonous drugs, and paid special tribute to the work of Representative PORTER.

"Representative PORTER explained that his resolution called upon the governments to stop the manufacture of heroin, now confined to some six or seven countries, and the suppression of the traffic in prepared opium within 15 years."

The officers of the American group were duly elected, as follows:

OFFICERS

President: Representative THEODORE E. BURTON.

Vice presidents: Representative ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, Virginia; Representative WILLIAM A. OLDFIELD, Arkansas; Representative HENRY W. TEMPLE, Pennsylvania.

Treasurer: Representative ADOLPH J. SABATH, Illinois.

Secretary: Representative JOHN J. MCSWAIN, South Carolina.

Executive secretary: Arthur Deerin Call, 613 Colorado Building, Washington, D. C. Telephone, Main 7409. Cable address, "Ampax, Washington."

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

Representative THEODORE E. BURTON, Ohio, ex-officio chairman; Representative FRED BRITTEN, Illinois; Representative TOM CONNALLY, Texas; Representative HENRY ALLEN COOPER, Wisconsin; Representative CLARENCE F. LEA, California; Representative JAMES C. MCLAUGHLIN, Michigan; Senator ALBEN W. BARKLEY, Kentucky; Senator CHARLES CURTIS, Kansas; Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, Arkansas; Senator CLAUDE A. SWANSON, Virginia.

Mr. BURTON and Mr. MONTAGUE were elected members of the council.

Under "unfinished business" the executive secretary returned to the financial condition of the American group. He reminded the meeting that practically every group of the Interparliamentary Union provides for a grant included in the state budget for the expenses of the union. Many of the groups are supported by Government appropriations. For example, the Danish group received in 1926 5,400 Danish crowns and a special grant toward the expenses of the northern assembly of delegates. The Esthonian group provides from that portion of the state budget entitled "International expenditure, official journeys," for the traveling expenses of its delegates. The German group receives a grant of 15,000 reichmarks from the Government, 9,000 of which are turned over to the Geneva office and the balance used for traveling expenses. The Swedish group receives a grant of 15,000 Swedish crowns. The Norwegian group receives 9,000 Norwegian crowns for traveling expenses and 1,200 for administrative expenses. Substantial contributions for the traveling expenses of delegates are received by the Bulgarian groups, the Hungarian, the Italian, Polish, Rumanian, Yugoslav, and Czechoslovak groups. A sum of 45,000 French francs is placed at the disposal of the French group. Some of the groups—for example, the Egyptian and the Japanese—are officially constituted by the parliament and the expenses of their delegates automatically paid. The South and Central American groups fall also into this category. It may be now regarded as the exception for the members of the union not to receive contributions toward their traveling expenses. The matter of the support of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union is, however, a matter of course for the Congress to decide. A stenographic report of the remarks upon this matter follows:

"Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. Has this matter ever been taken up with those who have the preparation of appropriations?

"The CHAIRMAN. Mr. BURTON can answer that. I think perhaps we would not find a ready response.

"Mr. SABATH. So far I have never noticed any objection to the $6,000 appropriation. There was no opposition to the general appropriation of $50,000 for the last conference. So I am of the opinion that there would be no objection to making an appropriation of, say, $8,500, so that the $2,500 could be utilized for the general expenses of the committee.

"The CHAIRMAN. We have already passed the $6,000 item this year, I think.

"Mr. OLDFIELD. May I make a suggestion? Mr. BURTON is on the Committee on Foreign Affairs and Mr. PORTER is the chairman of the committee. I am sure that the Democratic members on that committee would not object to increasing this appropriation, and if the Foreign Affairs Committee would get behind it unanimously we could put it over in the House. I think it ought to be done. I think some reasonable amount ought to be appropriated by Congress to look after this matter. I really think it is a very important thing. I think when we get more Members of our two legislative bodies interested that this organization will probably do more for international peace than any other agency in the country. So I say I think it is important, and I believe if the Committee on Foreign Affairs will take hold of this thing and will be backed up by the Members here we can get some results. I am certainly in favor of trying to accomplish something along that line, although perhaps it is true that we can not expect to do anything at this session.

"Mr. BURTON. No; it is too late this session. But we ought to refer this to a committee to be chosen by the President, and they ought to go to work on it.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you make a motion to that effect?

"Mr. BURTON. Yes, Mr. Chairman; that a committee of five, let us say, be appointed to take the matter up.

"Mr. BRITTEN. I think we are getting a little away from the subject matter before the group. The suggestion was in regard to the financing in America of the officers and delegates of the American group, not a question of appropriating $6,000, which we appropriated for the expenses on the other side of the water. I have made some little inquiry into this thing, and the gentleman over here [Mr. SABATH], with his good business mind, has hit the nail on the head, and so has Mr. OLDFIELD. Something should be done. We are appropriating $6,000 a year. A matter of $2,500 more, I am sure, is something no one would object to for office expenses, postage, telephone, telegrams, etc., of the American group. It is not even worth talking about. I am quite certain that if the distinguished gentleman will get back of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that the next $6,000 appropriation going through the House can be so managed as to increase it $2,500 for the local office. I will be glad to help, and I know every member of the group present here will be glad to lend his assistance in that direction.

"Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. I agree with what has been said here. This is a great public movement in behalf of the peace of the world. The parliaments of the Interparliamentary Union, or many of them, are very sincere. Many of them are able to contribute to this thing, either to the expense of the local organization or in the payment of their expenses as delegates to these conferences; but a man's ability to serve in a great movement like this ought not to be limited by his ability to pay a contribution to this society or to pay his way as a delegate to the conference. It may be too late to do anything at this session—unless it could be done by unanimous consent—but I certainly think there ought to be an increase in this appropriation in the interest of the public. It is for all the people that these gentlemen are sacrificing their time and giving their efforts and talent and money, and I would suggest that we see if we can not get an increase even at this session. It may be possible. I am ready to do anything I can. It is possible we might get an allowance in the deficiency bill if no one objects.

"The CHAIRMAN. We would have to have an authorization, perhaps, and somebody might object to it.

"Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. I do not think a great organization like this ought to be put to the necessity of going around begging subscriptions for such an object as the one we have before us.

"Mr. PORTER. It does seem to me when we talk about $2,500 we are minimizing our activities. If we are going ahead with this matter let us have a proper appropriation. It is not fair that men should pay their own expenses to these conferences, and I would be happy to introduce a bill providing for sufficient funds to take care of these expenses, and I think we could put it through Congress. I am afraid it is a little late to do anything this session. The only way I see it could possibly be done is to tack it onto the deficiency bill now in the Senate.

"Mr. BURTON. What they would say would probably be that it has not the approval of the Budget, and it is probably too late this session.

"Mr. PORTER. Yes, sir; that is probably true. But I shall be happy when Congress recomvenes to confer with you gentlemen, and we will agree on a bill providing for somewhere near sufficient funds, because I confess that my travel around the world is very expensive, and it seems to me it is hardly fair when a man gives his time to a worthy object for nothing that he should also be required to pay his actual necessary expenses.

"I might add that the Committee on Foreign Affairs this year recommended and obtained appropriations for a number of conferences, such as the sanitary conference, the economic conference, the Geneva conference, and the public-health conference.

"Mr. OLDFIELD. And there was no trouble about it.

"Mr. PORTER. No.

"The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair suggest that the motion has prevailed (there being no objection) that the president, Mr. BURTON, appoint a committee of five to promote this matter.

"You understand, Mr. President, that it has been so ordered?

"Mr. BURTON. Yes, Mr. Chairman; and I will appoint a committee of five. If it is impracticable to do anything at this session, then I will take it up at the next session. I agree that Congress should have at least five delegates to attend these conferences, and I do not think we ought to be dependent upon the charity of any benevolent organizations or any individuals. There is a certain lack of a sense of independence that ought not to exist when delegates attend these conferences and their expenses have not been appropriated for by their government. They are on a public duty, and it seems to me that their governments ought to defray their expenses.

"Mr. SABATH. When I suggested $2,500 I did not mean to suggest that that should be the exact amount, but simply wanted to suggest that some sum should be appropriated to take care of the expenditures of the delegates and incidental expenses. I feel that if we need $10,000 we ought to be able to have it appropriated. We appropriate millions of dollars for the Army and the Navy, and ten thousand or twelve thousand dollars a year for this worthy object would be a mere trifle in comparison with our total appropriations.

"Mr. PORTER. Just one word more, Mr. Chairman. It is not only desirable that the delegates should be allowed their expenses so that they will not be out of pocket, but by making an appropriation you are going to add to the force and independence and dignity of the representation that you send to these conferences. You give your representation then a semiofficial sanction, if you appropriate a reasonable sum for the purpose. To me that feature is more important than the actual money appropriation.

"The CHAIRMAN. I think that is very true. There is only one possible point that might be raised as against an appropriation to pay expenses of delegates, and that would be that it might be said that it might lead to a scramble for the places as delegates. I hope that is not true, however."

Upon motion of Mr. BRITTEN, the meeting adjourned at 12 o'clock noon.

(Signed) ARTHUR DEERIN CALL,
Executive Secretary.

FEBRUARY 24, 1927.

[H. Res. 9205, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 12, 1928.

Mr. BRITTEN introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

A bill to authorize an appropriation for the American group of the Interparliamentary Union

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to assist in meeting the annual expenses of the Interparliamentary Union there is hereby authorized an appropriation of $10,000.

THE PARIS CONFERENCE, AUGUST 25–30, 1927

The American group of the Interparliamentary Union was represented at the twenty-fourth conference in Paris as follows: By Senators ELMER THOMAS, MILLARD E. TYDINGS, and LAWRENCE D. TYSON; and by Representatives A. PIATT ANDREW, SOL BLOOM, THEODORE E. BURTON (president of the group), FRED A. BRITTEN, EMANUEL CELLER, THOMAS C. COCHRAN, ROY G. FITZGERALD, JED JOHNSON, EDGAR HOWARD, ANDREW J. MONTAGUE (vice president of the group), STEPHEN G. PORTER, FRED S. BURNELL, HATTON W. SUMNERS, and by two former Members of the Congress, William D. B. Ainey and Richard Bartholdt. The executive secretary, Arthur Deerin Call, accompanied the group. Ladies accompanying the party were Miss Ainey, Mrs. Laura S. Price, Mrs. Emanuel Celler, Miss Jane Celler, Mrs. Jed Johnson, Mrs. Andrew J. Montague, Mrs. Isabel Ball Baker, Mrs. Kate S. Davis, Mrs. Lawrence D. Tyson, Mrs. Sol Bloom, and Miss Vera Bloom.

Thirty-three parliaments were represented at the conference: Germany, United States, Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Canada, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Estonia, Finland, France, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Dutch Indies, British Indies, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Lithuania, Mexico, Nicaragua, Norway, Holland, Peru, the Philippines, Poland, Rumania, Salvador, Sweden, Switzerland, and Czechoslovakia; with a total of 440 delegates.

The sessions of the conference were held in the French Senate. Receptions were numerous and of that welcoming kind peculiar to the graciousness of France. In the evening of August 24 the organization committee gave a reception in the Palais du Luxembourg to the delegates and their ladies. The next day the delegates were received by officials of Paris in the city hall. Friday, the 26th, there were two receptions, one in the Elysée Palais by M. Gaston Doumergue, President of the French Republic, and another in the Palais Royal by M. Paul Painlevé. There was a reception at the Quai d'Orsay given by M. Briand, Minister of Foreign Affairs; and in the Palais Bourbon by M. Fernand Bouisson, president of the Chamber of Deputies. On Sunday the delegates were taken by special train to the Condé Castle at Chantilly. The entertainments came to a close with a final banquet in the Salle Wagram Tuesday evening, August 30, when the American group was represented among the speakers by Senator TYSON.

The conference was opened with addresses by Baron Adelsward, president of the conference; Paul Doumer, president of the French Senate; Fernand Merlin, president of the French group; and by M. Poincaré, Prime Minister of France. Mr. BURTON, of the American group, addressed the conference upon trade restrictions and upon the reduction of armaments; Mr. PORTER upon the traffic in noxious drugs; Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. SUMNERS, and Mr. MONTAGUE upon the codification of international law; Mr. HOWARD upon the reduction of armaments. Much of the work of the American group, however, was devoted to the meetings of the special commissions.

The conference was organized as follows:

President: Mr. Paul Doumer, president of the Senate of France.

Vice presidents: Messrs. Schückling (Germany), THEODORE E. BURTON (United States of America), Erwin Waihs (Austria), Fernand Cocq (Belgium), Vassileff (Bulgaria), Belcourt (Canada), Borgbjerg (Denmark), Luis F. Mejia (Dominican Republic), Mohamed Mahmoud Khalil Bey (Egypt), Auguste Rei (Estonia), O. Mantere (Finland), Lord Treowen (Great Britain), Panayoti Petridis (Greece), Albert de Berzeviczy (Hungary), Schumann (Dutch East Indies), Michael Hayes (Ireland), di Stefano-Napolitani (Italy), Bukichi Miki (Japan), Kalnins (Latvia), Miguel F. Ortega (Mexico), Chamorro (Nicaragua), Wefring (Norway), Heemskerk (Holland), Gonzales Orbegozo (Peru), Benigno S. Aquino (Philippines), Bronislas Dembinski (Poland), Jean Th. Floresco (Rumania), Ruben Rivera (San Salvador), Baron Adelswärd (Sweden), de Meuron (Switzerland), J. Brabec (Czechoslovakia).

Secretary general: Christian L. Lange, Ph. D.

The resolutions as finally adopted by the conference were as follows:

I

THE FIGHT AGAINST DRUGS OF ADDICTION

A

The Twenty-fourth Interparliamentary Conference calls the very special attention of the groups of the union to the serious dangers attendant upon the abuse of opium and other drugs of addiction for the health and morality of the peoples, especially with regard to the younger generation.

The conference declares unanimously that the attainment of the ends aimed at in the fight against this abuse will only be reached by the following measures:

(a) Limitation of the culture of the poppy and of coca leaves and of the production of all narcotics to the recognized amount needed for medical and scientific purposes, this measure to include the total suppression of the use of opium for smoking.

(b) The establishment of a system of control by national or international means for the observance of the rules fixed to the above effect.

(c) The elimination of all profits by private dealers in the drug trade, with the exception of the drugs required for legitimate purposes as mentioned above.

B

The Twenty-fourth Interparliamentary Conference, taking note of the fact that under article 6, chapter 2, of The Hague convention of 1912, the contracting powers undertook to adopt measures for the suppression of the manufacture, trade in, and use of prepared opium within the territories subject to their jurisdiction, recommends for the consideration of the groups of the union to urge the Governments concerned to set a definite term not to exceed 15 years, within which the manufacture, trade in, and use of prepared opium within their respective territories and possessions be finally and completely suppressed.

C

Considering that the two conferences held at Geneva from November, 1924, to February, 1925, resulted in the conclusion of a series of international agreements concerning the gradual limitation of the abusive use of opium and of other dangerous drugs, and making for the establishment of effective control and supervision of the use of such drugs, and seeing that opinions differ as to the value of those agreements, the conference recommends that the groups who regard the agreements as an important step toward the achievement of the ends in view urge their respective parliaments and governments to see that the Geneva agreements are ratified by their country without delay, and asks the groups who are unable to share this opinion to make every effort to induce their States to endeavor to revise those agreements at the first possible opportunity in accordance with the principles enumerated in Resolution I.

In the meantime those groups are asked to make every effort to induce their states to exercise a strict control on the manufacture and export of narcotics, in view of the fact that it is practically impossible to supervise the traffic.

D

The conference recommends that the groups shall examine the possibility of obtaining the adoption by legislative and administrative measures of the prohibition of the production and distribution of heroin.

E

Whereas the great dangers above mentioned created by the abuse of drugs of addiction may compromise the reconstruction in the social and economic field which is recognized as necessary, after the World War, in next to all countries, the Interparliamentary Bureau is requested to transmit these resolutions to all the groups of the union and to all the governments and parliaments of the world.

II

A SYSTEM OF CUSTOMS AGREEMENTS BETWEEN THE COUNTRIES OF EUROPE

A

The Twenty-fourth Interparliamentary Conference realizes that the predominating factor in the economic field in our times is the economic interdependence of all nations on what has become a world market. It believes, in common with the economic conference held at Geneva in 1927, that the "effort to attain self-sufficiency can not hope to succeed unless it is justified by the size, natural resources, economic advantages, and geographical situation of a country."

The conference recalls the fact that the Twenty-third Interparliamentary Conference, which met at Washington and Ottawa in 1925, passed a resolution declaring—

"that it would be of the greatest importance for good relations between European states and thus contribute to guarantee the peace of the world, if the economic barriers at present dividing these states were, as far as possible, abolished,

"and that such measures probably, in any case in the long run, would contribute to create a steady and more extensive market for the products of European agriculture and industry, and therefore also to decrease the cost of production and the danger of unemployment in Europe."

The conference desires to record its profound satisfaction at the meeting of the International Economic Conference, held in Geneva in May, 1927, and pays tribute to the noteworthy work achieved by that conference. It seconds the conclusions and recommendations formulated by the economic conference with regard to tariff and commercial problems.

It lays particular stress on the importance of giving immediate effect to the suggestions made by the economic conference that "the Council of the League of Nations should intrust the economic organization to undertake, in connection with the inquiry provided for in the preceding recommendations, all the necessary discussions, consultations, and inquiries to enable it to propose the measures best calculated to secure either identical tariff systems in the various European countries or at least a common basis for commercial treaties, as well as the establishment, for all countries, of clearly defined and uniform principles as to the interpretation and scope of the most-favored-nation clause in regard to customs duties and other charges."

The conference sees in the unanimity with which the conclusions of the Geneva Economic Conference with regard to European commercial policy were adopted, a striking proof of the existence of a profound sense of the economic solidarity of the nations of Europe, and believes that unanimity to be of happy augury for the work to be accomplished for the liquidation of the system of superprotection now in force in Europe.

It further places on record that most of the states of Europe have now achieved stabilization of their currencies, while in the remaining states there is a tendency toward such stabilization.

B

In view of the facts set forth above, the Twenty-fourth Interparliamentary Conference issues an urgent invitation to all the national groups of the union to direct every effort toward a systematic pursuance of the work in favor of the creation of a system of customs agreements between the countries of Europe. It lays special stress on the importance of the following measures:

(a) The abolition at the first possible moment of absolute prohibitions of imports and exports, except in cases where such prohibitions is dictated by bona fide considerations of a sanitary nature or relating to the maintenance of order within a State (e. g., alcoholic drinks, opium, etc.). Attention is called to the international conference on this subject which will meet in November, 1927, under the auspices of the League of Nations.

(b) The abolition of bounties on exports in order to discourage the system of dumping.

(c) The simplification of customs formalities on the basis of the Geneva convention of November 3, 1923.

(d) The unification of the nomenclature of customs tariffs, particularly in respect of the most important goods.

(e) The ratification of the Barcelona and Geneva conventions on transit.

(f) The conclusion of long-term international commercial treaties in order to insure the stability of customs relations, the extension of international trade, and a steady market for industrial and agricultural products.

(g) The general adoption, on unconditional terms, of the most-favored-nation clause.

(h) The solution by arbitration or by a chamber of the international court of justice, of contestations with regard to the interpretation and application of contractual customs stipulations.

C

The Twenty-fourth Interparliamentary Conference regrets to note a general tendency among the states to raise their customs tariffs. It recommends that the national groups shall endeavor to arrest and to reverse that tendency.

D

The conference recognizes that the conclusion of regional customs agreements between countries having special interests in common is in accordance with the general aim of lowering the barriers in the way of international trade, on condition that such agreements be not directed against a third party.

E

The conference moreover invites the League of Nations energetically to pursue the work so well begun in the economic field and to take steps to induce its members to contribute to the realization of the proposals of the economic conference, for the amelioration of economic conditions in Europe and in the world in general.

F

The Interparliamentary Union seeing that vast customs' unions, such as the European Customs' Union, are highly desirable, as much from the point of view of economic prosperity as from that of the progress of concord and peace; seeing, however, that the immediate suppression of all customs' duties would, in the world's present condition, provoke a very serious crisis and can not be recommended, expresses the wish that methods of abolishing, or at least progressively and gradually reducing, customs duties be made an object of study in all countries, the annual diminution of these duties being unimportant enough not to bring about a crisis and enabling, on the contrary, the various national industries to adapt themselves without bad results to the régime of vast customs unions.

G

These resolutions shall be transmitted forthwith to the League of Nations and to the governments.

III

ABOLITION OF PASSPORT VISAS

The conference reiterates the recommendation of the Stockholm conference of 1921 and the Berne-Geneva conference of 1924 in favor of the abolition of passport visas, without prejudice to any measures which may be considered necessary for the security of the state.

IV

REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS

RESOLUTION

The Twenty-fourth Interparliamentary Conference recalling the fact that the states signatories of the peace treaties of 1919–20 and of the covenant of the League of Nations, unanimously recognized that the maintenance of peace requires "the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations";

Seeing that by virtue of the aforementioned peace treaties, the armaments of certain states have been reduced and limited "in order to render possible the initiation of a general limitation of the armaments of all nations";

Seeing that this preparation for a convention of general limitation has, thanks to the sustained efforts of the preparatory disarmament committee of the League of Nations, resulted, in spite of numerous reservations, in unanimously accepted drafts in favor of the limitation of armaments for land and air, but has not succeeded in reconciling the various points of view expressed in the matter of naval armaments;

Seeing that these failures have caused great disappointment to those who, suffering from the effects of the present economic disorder, count on seeing their hopes realized by means of the reduction of the burden of military organization;

Expresses the wish that the governments, basing themselves on the lofty principles of the covenant of the League of Nations, employ with energy every means in their power to favor an appeal to arbitration in case of contest between states, to insure security for each state, facilitate the general reduction of armaments, and hasten the common work necessary for the achievement of this threefold result;

The conference asks the groups of the union to work for this end within their respective parliaments and with their governments, with all the energy which the situation demands, and invites them to organize active popular propaganda in order that public opinion may express itself imperiously in favor of the reduction of armaments and the reign of justice between the nations.

TECHNICAL PLAN FOR A GENERAL REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS

PREAMBLE

The Twenty-fourth Interparliamentary Conference, recalling the fact that the Interparliamentary Conference of Washington and Ottawa proclaimed "the necessity of giving to the nations a feeling of security";

Believing that in addition to the security guaranteed by the League of Nations, and which the union wishes to see more well defined and more efficacious, one of the means, and one of the most important, of reaching that end would be a general reduction of armaments;

Considering, moreover, that the peace treaties of 1919–20 fix limits for the armaments of certain states "in order to render possible the initiation of a general limitation of armaments of all nations";

And in view of the fact that a committee constituted by the League of Nations in pursuance of article 8 of the covenant with the mission of preparing a general disarmament conference, is at present engaged in the elaboration of a draft convention for the reduction of armaments, is happy to see the United States of America cooperating in the work of the said preparatory committee, and expresses the wish that other states not members of the League of Nations may also join in the work before the meeting of the disarmament conference.

It notes with satisfaction that the technical studies and the discussions of the preparatory committee have, in spite of all the imperfections which characterize them, served to clear the ground to a certain extent and to prepare the way for the elaboration of a draft convention.

It recommends to the attention of the governments and members of the conference the general technical plan for a limitation and reduction of armaments accompanying the present resolution, in being understood that paragraphs A, B, and C of Chapter II (Special Rules), in particular, are meant to serve as examples. It invites the national groups of the union to transmit the said plan to their respective governments and parliaments and requests the Interparliamentary Bureau to communicate it to the preparatory committee.

TECHNICAL PLAN

I. General principles

A. Agreements as to the limitation and reduction of armaments of the several states must take the following principles into account, except in cases of an entirely special character:

1. In fixing the limit of the armaments of each state, the whole of the elements of a military, geographical, demographical, economic, financial, moral, and political order which may constitute the war potential ("potentiel de guerre") of the state in question must be taken into account, but the limitation should in principle affect only land, naval, and air armaments properly speaking.

2 Further, regard must be had, when fixing that limit, to the length of frontiers and of coast, to the particularly exposed situation of a given state and to the special tasks incumbent on states which are colonial powers.

3. The limit of armaments of each state must be such that no state retain a force or war potential enabling it to constitute a hegemony and to defy the decisions of the authorities of the League of Nations, taken in conformity with the covenant of the league.

B. No state is authorized to increase its present armaments. States whose present armaments exceed the limits which shall be agreed upon shall proceed to a gradual reduction of armaments in conformity with the following principles:

1. The basis for the gradual reduction of armaments is obtained by taking the average of the armaments of the state in question during the three (five) financial years preceding the year * * *.

2. The elements to be taken into account in calculating the average for each state shall be:

(a) Peace-time effectives and effectives which can be mobilized within a given time in all land, sea, and air forces.

(b) The duration of active military service.

(c) The annual contingent of recruits.

(d) The total tonnage of war vessels.

(e) The total tonnage of the air force attached to the army and the navy.

(f) The total sum expended annually for armaments on land, at sea, and in the air.

The expenditure referred to under (f) shall be calculated on a gold basis. In addition to military expenditure properly speaking, provision shall be made in the total expenditure allowed for all credits allocated to the following purposes:

Subsidies for the development of national industries, with a view to their mobilization in the event of war.

Subsidies to the mercantile marine on condition of possible transformation of merchant ships into warships.

Subsidies to civil aviation, with a view to the utilization of the machines in the event of war.

3. The total military expenditure of whatsoever nature shall be reduced in a proportion to be agreed upon, beginning as from the financial year 19 * * *. This reduction shall be repeated every * * * years, always taking as basis the average of the three (five) financial years originally decided upon, until the average has reached the final limits to be agreed upon.

4. Extraordinary military expenditure incurred as a result of a recommendation of the Council of the League of Nations shall not be considered as forming part of the expenditure to which the reduction applies.

II. Special rules

A. LAND FORCES

1. Peace-time effectives and effectives which can be mobilized within a given time must not be increased and must be gradually reduced in conformity with the general principles enumerated above.

2. A certain proportion, not to be exceeded, must be fixed between the number of officers and noncommissioned officers and of men under arms or who can be mobilized within a given time.

3. The number of rifles, machine guns, and cannons of various calibers must be limited to a certain proportion corresponding to the peace-time effectives and to the contingent of recruits, in conformity with the principles laid down in the peace treaties of 1919–20 concerning the limitation of armaments of certain countries.

4. The maximum caliber of cannons must be fixed.

5. Tanks must be prohibited.

6. The preparation of means of chemical and bacteriological warfare and training in their use must be forbidden.

7. The numerical strength of the police force and customs officers must be limited.

8. The organization of associations not recognized by the official military authorities and giving military instruction to their members must be forbidden. In estimating the total forces, account must be taken of private organizations recognized by the authorities, as well as of the forces organized by the State itself.

B. NAVAL FORCES

1. Within the limits of the total tonnage of each State the tonnage of different categories of vessels must be limited in conformity with the principles contained in the treaty of Versailles concerning the German Navy.

2. New naval construction must be prohibited during a period of years to be agreed upon, and engagements taken as to the delay to be observed in the replacement of vessels of different categories.

3. The maximum tonnage of each category of vessels to be constructed, as well as the caliber and number of cannons, must be limited.

4. Submarines must be prohibited.

5. The construction of new naval bases must be prohibited.

6. The number of effectives in the navy and the annual contingents for naval service must be limited in proportion to the total tonnage in order to prevent marines from being used as reinforcements for the land army.

C. AIR FORCES

1. Military aircraft should be employed exclusively for reconnoitering purposes. The limits of those military air forces must be fixed in proportion to the forces of the army and navy of each country.

2. The number of pilots receiving military instruction must be fixed in proportion to the air units.

3. The number of machines, as well as their total engine power, must be limited.

D. MILITARY EXPENDITURE

The annual expenditure—

(a) On equipment and ammunition for the land army in the mother country, as well as in the other territories under the authority of the state;

(b) On naval material—ships, armament, etc.;

(c) On material for the air force must not be increased and must be gradually reduced in a proportion to be agreed upon.

E. DEMILITARIZED ZONES

1. With a view to removing the danger of frontier incidents and to creating a greater sense of security within the States, demilitarized zones shall be created, especially on exposed frontiers.

2. These zones shall be placed, if need be, under international supervision.

III. Supervision

1. A permanent disarmament committee composed of representatives of the states parties to the convention shall be created with the mission of supervising the execution and application of the rules agreed upon, and their adaptation to changed circumstances.

2. States shall be under obligation to furnish to that committee detailed information concerning the elements of their land, naval, and air organization, including all necessary information concerning their military expenditure.

3. The secretariat of the League of Nations shall publish each year an abstract of the military expenditure of each state, reckoned in gold francs, and all other information as to their military—land, naval, and air—preparations.

4. In order to facilitate the publication of the above abstract, the states shall supply a statement of all credits affected to military, naval, and air purposes on the basis of a common uniform model.

5. Each state shall have the right to bring to the attention of the committee any fact which, in its opinion, constitutes an infraction of the agreements concerning the limitation of armaments. The committee may submit the case to the council of the League of Nations.

6. The council of the league may order an inquiry on the spot.

7. The council shall give a decision as to the justness of the complaint. Contested decisions shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice.

8. In order that the application of the dispositions prohibiting the preparation of the means of chemical or bacteriological warfare, as well as training in their use, may more easily be supervised, an international organization of the industries concerned shall be created under the ægis of the League of Nations.

IV. Final provisions

1. The permanent disarmament committee shall propose and submit to the contracting powers any modification to the convention which it considers useful.

2. The gradual reduction shall continue until

(a) the peace-time effectives, including officers and noncommissioned officers, do not exceed three per thousand of the population of the state concerned;

(b) the effectives which can be mobilized within a given time do not exceed 12 per thousand of the population;

(c) the peace-time effectives of native troops in territory outside that of the mother country do not exceed 3 per thousand of the population of those territories, and the native effectives which can be mobilized do not exceed 12 per thousand of the population of those territories;

(d) the naval forces do not exceed 4,000 tons per million inhabitants of the mother country and 700 tons per million inhabitants of other parts of the state or empire in question.

3. These figures may, however, be increased or reduced in a proportion to be fixed by the convention, taking into account the facts mentioned in the general principles enumerated under A.

4. States whose armaments are already below the limits specified in this plan need not proceed to the gradual reduction referred to in Chapters I B and II. They will be subject, together with the other States, to the supervision provided for in Chapter III.

5. States which consider that their situation allows them to disarm more rapidly or in a greater measure than is provided for by the above stipulations, are at full liberty to do so.

V

METHODS FOR THE CODIFICATION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

A

In view of the importance and urgency of a progressive codification of international law, considering that by such codification the flagrant injustices and numerous uncertainties which characterize international law in its present state would be eliminated and that a stable and generally accepted basis would then be created for the solution of international disputes in the supreme interest of peace; in view of the recommendation made to the Council of the League of Nations by the committee of experts for the progressive codification of international law, to the effect that the codification of a first series of subject matters which, in the opinion of the experts and according to the declarations of a considerable number of governments, are to be regarded as ready for such a codification, should be taken in hand; the twenty-fourth interparliamentary conference warmly supports the recommendation and records the wish that a first conference on public international law be summoned as soon as possible, and that all states, whether members or not of the league, be invited to participate in it, with a view to giving practical and tangible effect to the highly important work of the committee of experts.

B

In view of the very satisfactory progress made in the work pursued up till now by the committee of experts of the League of Nations, the conference recommends that the committee of experts, functioning as a permanent committee, as is the case with other bodies within the league, shall be invited to pursue and push forward its studies with a view to preparing fresh preliminary draft conventions on other chapters of public international law the codification of which appears desirable and feasible.

It insists on the importance of a thorough and conscientious preparation of the work of the conference on public international law and recommends in particular that the present and future work of the committee also embrace the question of the unification of certain principles of international penal law, and be carefully studied in every quarter concerning itself with the development of international law, and that it be, if necessary, coordinated with the work of other competent institutions, and especially with that of the Pan American Union.

C

The conference recalls the resolution voted by the twenty-third conference held at Washington and Ottawa in 1925 recommending the drafting of a general synthetic plan of codification of public international law, and requests the committee for juridical questions of the union to submit the draft of such a plan to the next interparliamentary conference.

The draft shall regard war solely as a crime against international law (with the exception, however, of the right of legitimate defense which justifies a resort to arms), and must consquently include, in addition to positive law, rules intended to secure the law of peace (friendly arrangements, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, resort to international jurisdiction) as well as rules relating to the ultimate execution of decisions reached.

Article V of the statutes of the union reads:

"The duty of a national group is to keep its parliament informed, through its committee or through one of its members, of resolutions adopted at the conferences which call for parliamentary or governmental action.

"The Interparliamentary Union expects its members to do their utmost to see that the work of the union is made known throughout their respective countries in order to obtain as large a measure of support as possible. It also invites them to assist to the best of their ability in the maintenance of peace among the nations."

This has been interpreted to mean not that every group is expected to carry into effect all the resolutions voted at all the conferences; rather that the resolutions shall be brought to the knowledge of the various parliaments for such action as they may think best.

The executive committee of the Interparliamentary Union has made a selection of those resolutions of the recent conferences which in its judgment should more particularly engage the attention of the groups. As enumerated in the program of the bureau for 1928, these special resolutions are:

1. On "The control of foreign policy," voted by the Berne-Geneva conference in 1924. (See Compte Rendu, 1924, p. 665.)

2. "The private manufacture of and the traffic in arms and munitions," voted by the Berne-Geneva conference in 1924. (See Compte Rendu, 1924, p. 670.)

3. The "Institution of paritative committees," with the view of preventing conflicts between subjects of a given country belonging to different nationalities. This resolution was voted by the Washington-Ottawa conference in 1925. (See Compte Rendu, 1925, p. 802.)

4. The "Fight against drugs of addiction," a resolution voted at the Paris conference in 1927. (See resolution No. 1.)

5. "Customs agreements between the countries of Europe," voted by the Paris conference in 1927. (See resolution No. 2.)

THE UNION'S PUBLICATIONS

Each of the conferences of the Interparliamentary Union is reported in a volume called the Compte Rendu. This report of the Paris conference contains 591 pages. There is an official bimonthly publication of the bureau, called the Interparliamentary Bulletin. In addition the union issues from time to time other documents.

Members desiring further information relative to the union will wish to communicate with the executive secretary, 613 Colorado Building, Washington, D. C. (telephone, Main 7409).

INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS IN PENNSYLVANIA COAL FIELDS

Mr. DENEEN. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, with an additional amendment, Senate Resolution 105. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KING. Let the resolution be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 105) submitted by Mr. JOHNSON January 9, 1928, and reported with amendments by the Committee on Interstate Commerce on February 13 (calendar day, February 15), 1928, and by unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Interstate Commerce were, on page 1, line 2, after the words "Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce," to insert "or a subcommittee thereof"; on page 2, line 4, after the word "committee," to insert "or a subcommittee thereof"; on the same page, in line 10, after the word "committee," to insert the words "or a subcommittee thereof"; on the same page, in line 13, after the word "committee," to insert the words "or a subcommittee thereof"; on the same page, in line 15, after the word "committee," to insert the words "or a subcommittee thereof"; and in line 22, on the same page, after the word "committee," to insert the words "or a subcommittee thereof."

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was, on page 2, line 11, after the word "thereof," to insert the words "which shall not exceed $10,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. There was so much confusion in the Chamber that I could not ascertain from the reading of the resolution what committee is to conduct the proposed investigation.

Mr. JOHNSON. The investigation is to be conducted by the Committee on Interstate Commerce or a subcommittee thereof.

Mr. NORRIS. I had supposed it would be conducted by the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from California?

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall be very glad to give it to the Senator.

Mr. KING. In view of the statements appearing in the press concerning the deplorable conditions of the miners and their families in the district referred to, I wish to ask the Senator from California whether the State officials have made an investigation or have set up any instrumentalities to make an investigation or whether steps have been taken to protect the miners in their rights, if their rights have been violated; and, if not, why not? In other words, was it necessary to come to Congress to secure an investigation in order to ascertain the facts? Was there a lack of State machinery to deal with the situation, or has the State machinery broken down?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that I am justified in saying that the State machinery has entirely done so. One of the reasons, however, why we have come to Congress is that it is an interstate affair, concerning a languishing industry, which I concede, and conditions resulting therefrom of privation and want which ought as well to be investigated. The only body that can afford any remedy is the Federal Legislature. It is my hope, and it is the hope of those who have investigated this matter as I have, that the Interstate Commerce Committee, or its subcommittee which shall be intrusted with this work, will do what may be essential in the way of recommendation not only to relieve the human suffering that has resulted from a languishing industry that is interstate but may present a permanent cure for those conditions. That is the purpose of the resolution.

So far as the State authorities are concerned, I am unable to say that they have either with the celerity or the alacrity which I would like to see endeavored to accomplish the results sought to be accomplished by this resolution.

Mr. KING. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I wish to say in behalf of Governor Fisher, of Pennsylvania, that he has examined diligently and thoroughly into the allegations of brutality by State police and by coal and iron police; that he has required the surrender of the commissions of a great number of the latter; that he has had an investigation in progress—and it is still in progress—to determine the correctness of the actions of both types of police.

So far as conditions of distress exist—and they do exist—the communities there have been active in extending relief. I know that is true of my own city of Pittsburgh. Very large funds have been privately collected there for the relief of the families of miners who are living in barracks. There is undoubtedly great distress; we in Pennsylvania know that to be so; and we do not need to have investigating committees to learn of it, so far as we are concerned, because it is apparent to everyone who looks; but when it is proposed to have an agency of the Federal Government examine into conditions there we are glad to have that done, because we want the remainder of the country to know what we already know to our sorrow.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the situation as reported, and in view of the questions presented for solution, and that a real solution may require Federal legislation, I shall vote for the resolution. I regret, however, that conditions should arise in any State as to its domestic and internal policies which must be brought to the door of the Federal Government.

It is unfortunate that under our dual form of government the States do not always rise to their responsibilities. To the extent that they are inert the opportunity for aggrandizement by the Federal Government becomes greater, and in time its functions may become usurpatory of the functions and the assertion of power by the General Government increases its desire for power. Thus the States are weakened and their responsibilities are taken over by the Federal Government.

The State of Pennsylvania has more than 10,000,000 people; it is a great industrial Commonwealth; and there ought to be enough statesmanship, there ought to be enough humanity—and humanity and the social aspects of life constitute the greater part of statesmanship—among its people to care for the domestic and internal affairs of the State. If social conditions arise demanding attention—and they are within the competency of the State to deal with—it is its duty, if legislation is needed, to enact the same to care for any evils or cure any maladies, social or domestic, that may exist.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I fully agree with what the Senator says, that the State is perfectly competent to take care of itself as well as the Federal Government can take care of it, but I should like to ask the Senator if he were the Governor of Pennsylvania what he would do?

We can not compel men to work when they have gone on strike and do not want to go back to work. We can not compel the operators of the mines to pay wages that the market price of coal will not provide. I tell you, Mr. President, that both the miner and the operator are ground down by the force of competition to a point where a decent living return to either of them is wholly impossible; and if the Governor of Pennsylvania were a magician he could not cure that situation.

Mr. KING. What the Senator says may be true; but it seems to me that if a condition exists such as has been indicated the legislature of the State might be convened and adopt measures that would ameliorate conditions, if not cure them. The Senator knows that the inhibitions upon the States are not such as exist with respect to the Federal Government. A State may do many things which the Federal Government has no power to do. A State may have no prohibition in its constitution against dealing with questions of the character involved in the present coal situation in a manner calculated to bring the operators and miners together, or to solve the whole problem. Under the police powers of the States, in the absence of State constitutional restriction, the States have very great powers in dealing with strikes and controversies between capital and labor. I am not criticizing Pennsylvania or its officials, nor do I charge that they have failed in the performance of their duties. I reiterate, however, my regret that the question, which is a domestic one and so vitally affects the peace and welfare of the State, should not be settled by the parties themselves, by the State, in a manner just and fair to all.

Industrial questions often present serious difficulties; indeed, many so-called political problems are at bottom economic and industrial. The social and industrial phases of life are not always determined by academic theories or political formulas. I know many of the sorrows and tragedies that follow strikes and lockouts. I acted as attorney upon several occasions for striking miners. They believed that they had been wronged, and a serious situation developed which disturbed the peace of the State. My sympathies were aroused in their behalf because I felt that they had just grievances.

The coal-mining situation is one which presents difficulties and problems not easily solved. There are too many coal mines, not only in Pennsylvania but in many States. In my own State we have an unfortunate situation. Few mines have realized any profits, and a number have been closed down. Many hundreds, if not thousands, of persons have been compelled to seek employment in other channels of life. The demand for coal was small measured by the capacity for production, and this situation produced conditions unfavorable to the mine owners as well as the miners.

I hope that the results of the investigation contemplated by this resolution will be helpful and that some plan may be devised which will prevent a repetition of the sad and tragic conditions to which the attention of the Senate has been called upon so many occasions during the past few years.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. KING. I will yield first to the Senator from Pennsylvania, because he addressed me first and probably desires to continue the inquiry which he propounded.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I do not wish to continue it very long.

Mr. KING. When the Senator from Pennsylvania shall have finished I shall yield very glady to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask the Senate to understand that throughout the Pennsylvania and Ohio fields the mine workers are unionized; they are competing with districts in which the mine workers are not unionized. Throughout Pennsylvania and Ohio there are now about three miners for every place that exists for a man who wants to work in the coal industry; there are about three times as many mines as there is any need for. The industry was greatly overstimulated during the war time. That district has been trying since the war to work with union labor or to pay substantially the union scale even where it was running an open shop.

There is a great overcapacity in the industry. It comes in competition with those southern districts that lie in Virginia and southern West Virginia and Kentucky and Tennessee, where the wage scale is very substantially less, where the taxes per acre paid by the coal owner are only about one-tenth what we have to pay; and then, too, there is this never-ending disagreement as to freight rates.

We can give illustrative cases, and so can they, which, taken alone, indicate that our rates are either too high or too low, as the case may be. At the present moment coal is brought from Pocahontas to Washington at exactly the same freight rate that it is brought from Meyersdale, Pa., to Washington, although their coal travels exactly twice as many miles as does ours. Our people give an instance like that. It is countered immediately by the representatives of those States, citing instances that to them seem unfair. Our people believe, whether they are right or they are wrong, that the third great factor that tells against them is an injustice in freight rates; but the fact remains that down there in the southern fields the mines are working fairly regularly; employment is provided for those men in those mines nearly every day in the week; while our mines, if you please, union or nonunion, hard coal or soft coal, are running less than half the week where they are running at all; and the price of our product is so low that, as I said before, neither miner nor mine owner can have any possible hope of a proper return for the contribution that he makes to the production of the commodity.

If the Governor of Pennsylvania were anything else than a mint, he could not correct that situation. He has it at heart just as much as we have, and it is the biggest problem in my State; and if any of us could devise a cure for that condition to-day they would build monuments to him in every city in Pennsylvania. It is not because we do not care; it is because we are at our wits' end to know how to handle the difficulty.

Bear in mind those factors, I beg of the Senate—too many mines; too many miners; severe competition with these newly developed districts in the South; high taxes per acre, approximately ten times per acre what is paid by our competitors; the effort to maintain a higher wage scale in the face of the declining price; and then this never-ending unhappiness that pervades the industry on the subject of the railroad rates that are paid. It is fair to say that most of the coal that we send to our customers pays more to the railroad than it does to the coal industry. The cost of getting it to the consumer exceeds the cost of mining it and putting it on the railroad cars.

Those are the causes; and it is not because we are indifferent. You can not be indifferent. I drive in almost any direction from my town of Pittsburgh, and I have very few miles to go before I find people living in conditions that ought to be impossible in this great country of ours. I would do anything on earth to correct it if I could. It is not enough to say, "Settle your strike." Suppose the mine workers gave in to-day and tried to go back to work. They could not find the work. The men of these families who are living in barracks have mighty little work waiting for them if they would surrender in their strike. Suppose the mine operators, the owners of the mines, give in and surrender in this strike. They are equally out of luck, because they have neither the market nor the market price that will enable them to pay a fair wage.

We talk of prosperity or we talk of farm problems; but I doubt if there is any problem in the business world in America to-day that seems so insoluble as does this calamity that confronts the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I want to make plain to the Senate that I am interested in getting the resolution passed so that we may get to work. I do not want to indulge in animadversion or in criticism at all. Some of the questions that were asked me by the distinguished Senator from Utah might perhaps have been answered in a much more critical way. I do not now wish to indulge in that. I recognize something of what has been said by the Senator from Pennsylvania. There is an industry that is languishing, that has had its trials and its tribulations. It is a basic industry. I recognize that. I recognize, too, I think, what he perhaps may not recognize as well as I do, some of the contributing causes to that languishing industry.

I should like, if it were possible, by this resolution and by the subsequent investigation by the Interstate Commerce Committee, not only to relieve the human distress that is appealing to me, of course, and more appealing than any other part of the investigation, but I should like, too—and in that connection I have been in consultation with those in the Department of Labor and with the Secretary of Labor—to endeavor to present something that will remedy the conditions that exist, not only from the human aspect but from the economic as well; and this resolution, if you will recall, is predicated, so far as its jurisdiction is concerned, upon the investigation of all of the causes that have contributed to the conditions in the Pennsylvania fields, and the railroad situation, in the endeavor, as it is asserted, to depress wages, as well as upon the instrumentalities of the courts and their use in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I shall vote for the Senator's resolution; but I should like to inquire if he has in mind a purpose to stifle competition and to transfer from one field to another this distress which has been depicted to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no, sir; by no means, sir. This is such a horrible condition up there, sir, that I would not wish it to spread. I would wish to curtail it in every possible way.

I believe it is quite so, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has said, that the Governor of Pennsylvania has instituted some inquiry into the coal and iron police; but the institution of that inquiry was very, very recent.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will, sir.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Away back last spring I sent photographs to the Governor of Pennsylvania from Pittsburgh showing the location of the first riot which occurred, and making the statement to him that the conduct of his State police was then criticized, and he started that investigation then. I speak of my own personal knowledge.

Mr. JOHNSON. I stand corrected if that be so. I spoke from the press alone.

So far as the relief that has been extended by the State of Pennsylvania is concerned, the first relief was extended by the churches in Pittsburgh, and was very slender, indeed. The next was by the little Sunday schools there. It is true the miners have been giving, to those who required it, $3 per week, and upon $3 per week families have been living in the coal fields of Pennsylvania. It is equally true that one week ago certain very excellent gentlemen in Pittsburgh met, and then they contributed some very large sums for relief of distress in the State of Pennsylvania. So that something has been accomplished thus far, at least, in the presentation of the matter. Much may be done by the passage of the resolution and the investigation.

I do not desire, as I repeat, to go into detail again concerning conditions or concerning the industry itself. I believe that the Interstate Commerce Committee is equipped, that it has the jurisdiction, that it is more or less familiar with the facts, and that with the aid of the Department of Labor as now constituted it may do a monumental work in accomplishment under this resolution, and I beg that it may be passed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I listened the other day with the greatest interest to the eloquent presentation of the facts by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. There is no question about the need and the suffering. There is no question that something ought to be done.

It is with extreme diffidence that I suggest that what ought to be done is not an investigation by Members of this lawmaking body, who would have to be taken away from their duty here if they made a proper personal study of the conditions in the field. It would not do for them to postpone such an investigation until after the Congress should adjourn. They ought to make it now, if at all. I can not help wondering why the Senator from California does not direct the Department of Labor to make this investigation. He has just stated that the committee would have to rely upon them, and it seems to me that it is eminently——

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. May I finish the sentence?

Mr. JOHNSON. I was going to answer the Senator's question if he was propounding a query to me; that was all.

Mr. BINGHAM. When I finish the sentence I shall be glad to have the Senator answer it. It seems to me that it is eminently fitting that the Secretary of Labor or his able department should be instructed to carry out just the investigation which the Senator proposes.

Now I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. One of the reasons, sir, that make this investigation necessary by the Senate, with its inquisitorial powers, is because the Secretary of Labor undertook to bring these parties together and to do what he could with the Government of the United States thus intervening through its Secretary of Labor; and the men in Pennsylvania who are the operators of the coal mines refused to meet with the Secretary of Labor of the United States. That is the reason, sir, why we can not ask the Secretary of Labor to undertake this investigation; and if you will read the remarks that I made a week ago upon this subject you will find inserted in them the letter of the Secretary of Labor to me, saying in so many words that he endeavored to bring the parties together, to have them meet in amity, and he sought to have some sort of arrangement made that might at least alleviate conditions up there, and the operators refused to meet with the Secretary of Labor. That is one of the reasons why this investigation is asked by the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I ask the Senator another question? If it is possible for us to give to certain Senators the power to make this investigation in Pennsylvania, why have we not the power to give to the Secretary of Labor the same power to make an investigation of this matter and to compel the attendance of witnesses?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think we could transfer the inquisitorial powers of this body to any official outside this body.

Mr. BINGHAM. Of course, Mr. President, I am one of those very old-fashioned people who do not like to see the Senate of the United States continue in its course of becoming the great national grand jury, and when the Senator from California refers to the inquisitorial powers of the Senate I am inclined to ask him where in the Constitution he finds authority for the Senate to exercise inquisitorial powers?

Mr. JOHNSON. It has the absolute power. We may take that for granted. I do not care to discuss that.

Mr. BINGHAM. I know we have been taking it for granted.

Mr. JOHNSON. And we have it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I would just like to make a statement about the jurisdiction of the Senate to act on problems of this character. It was debated fully and considered quite at length in the committee. My remarks also have reference to the question propounded by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

There are four allegations in this resolution. The first is that the committee is directed "to make a thorough and complete investigation of the conditions existing in the coal fields" of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio.

I doubt very seriously whether or not we could justly make that kind of investigation, because that doubtless does not come within the purview of our authority to investigate, in my judgment. The only authority that we have for investigation is that we may develop facts which may be the basis of legislation, and these coal mines, lying wholly within a State and being operated wholly within a State, are doubtless subject wholly to State jurisdiction.

The second allegation is this, "to ascertain whether the railroad companies and their officials have been or are, by agreement or otherwise, endeavoring to depress the labor cost of coal produced by union mine labor." In other words, an implied allegation that there is a conspiracy among various railroads to boycott the mines operated by union labor. That clearly falls within the purview of our authority to investigate. It might be made the subject of legislation legitimately by Congress. Therefore I think that Congress may very legitimately inquire into those conditions.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. That particular item is beyond the power of the States, as I understand it.

Mr. WATSON. That is my understanding.

Mr. FESS. There is rather a serious charge made by more or less responsible people, and I could not see how a State could make the inquiry, and for that reason I did not hesitate to vote for the authority of the Senate to make the investigation.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, can not the Interstate Commerce Commission do that?

Mr. FESS. That has jurisdiction simply over the question of rates, and could not handle the punitive idea that is here involved.

Mr. BINGHAM. Can not the Department of Justice do it, then?

Mr. FESS. It might.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the next question is whether or not in the said coal fields wage contracts have been abrogated or repudiated.

I doubt very seriously whether or not, if there were no other allegation than that in this resolution, we would have authority to investigate. That comes wholly within State jurisdiction, in my judgment. Then follows the fourth allegation, which is this, that—

> The said committee, or a subcommittee thereof, shall ascertain whether in industrial disputes or strikes in said coal fields injunctions have been issued in violation of constitutional rights, and whether by injunction or otherwise the rights granted by the Constitution of the United States have been abrogated and denied.

Clearly that is a legitimate subject for inquiry by the Senate of the United States and not by a State legislature, and I think not legitimately by a department of Government.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. So far as it relates to the Federal courts, at least.

Mr. WATSON. It relates to the Federal courts; that is the point exactly, it covers cases where constitutional rights have been violated.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, why is it not also proper to consider violations of constitutional rights by State courts just as well as Federal courts?

Mr. WATSON. I do not want to split hairs with my friend from Kentucky, because he and I are alike in advocating the passage of this measure, but I think that so far as injunctions have been issued by Federal courts and then violated, it is clearly a matter proper for inquiry by the Congress of the United States, either branch or both branches.

I do not believe, I will say to my friend from Connecticut, that it falls within the province of the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an investigation of this character. They are charged by the organic act which created them with certain specific duties, and their whole time is occupied in the discharge of those duties. I do not think they have the time, and I do not think really they have the machinery, to investigate a matter of this character.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I ask another question?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Why would it not be possible to redraft the resolution in such form as to refer to the proper Senate committee those parts of it which properly belong to the Congress, and which the Senator has just clearly pointed out should be given to the appropriate committee to investigate, which in this case would seem to me to be the Committee on the Judiciary, in the matter of the injunction, because that committee, as I understand it, now has before it an act relating to the abuse of injunctions. The other parts of the investigation, which the Senator from Indiana has said do not properly belong to the Congress, could be given to the Department of Labor or to the Department of Justice, as the case might be.

All I am trying to get at, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator in explanation of my question, is to avoid any further steps being taken by the Senate to become merely a grand jury instead of a proper body making laws, and in its judicial capacity seeing whether the laws are properly carried out by the Federal authorities.

Mr. WATSON. I will say to my friend that I quite fully agree with that view of the situation, but here is a case which so peculiarly calls for legislation, or, as it appears now, may call for legislation, that I think there is no escape from an investigation by a committee of the Senate.

If we have not jurisdiction over two of these allegations, we clearly have over the other two, and I think it would be taking two bites at the cherry to distribute the authority and investigate part of the matter by one committee and another part by another committee. I am not seeking, heaven knows, to have any further investigations sent to my committee, but if the Interstate Commerce Committee is to make this investigation, it should have jurisdiction to investigate the whole subject, and every phase of the whole subject, and ought to have, because you can not consider the parts which relate to State sovereignty and the parts relating to national sovereignty separately. They must be considered together by one committee, at one time, in my judgment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was not referring to any division between committees of matters relating to the States and the Federal Government, but why include an investigation of matters which the Senator himself admits is not the province of the Federal Government?

Mr. WATSON. The old rule was that where the court by any one phase of a question acquired jurisdiction of a proposition, it had jurisdiction for all phases of the proposition, and though I quite agree with the Senator that we should not become a body of snoopers and snipers whose sole business it is to investigate anything and everything under the sun, nevertheless I think this is a perfectly legitimate matter of inquiry by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just one statement in that connection?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I sympathize with the Senator from Connecticut in his insistence upon the proper separation of State and National functions, and with the Senator from Utah in his constant insistence on that, but the condition in this case is so desperate, the needs of relief, if there is any relief possible, are so great, that I do not believe anybody in Pennsylvania will assert any legal technicalities, and while I am not authorized to speak for every individual there, I do not believe this committee will even have to issue a subpœna. They will be welcomed to the State, and a request will suffice to bring any witness to tell everything he knows. There will be no disposition, I am sure, to contest or quibble over the authority of the committee to get the facts. We want them to have the facts.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to say a few minutes ago that the coal produced in Pennsylvania yields twice as much profit to the railroads that carry it to market as it yields to the operators who produce it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No, Mr. President, I did not say that. I said that in most cases the cost of getting it to market exceeded the cost of producing it at the tipple.

Mr. NEELY. In other words, the Pennsylvania coal operators pay more for the transportation of a ton of coal than they are able to retain from the proceeds of its sale for having produced it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I fancy that is true in West Virginia as well, is it not?

Mr. NEELY. It is true in West Virginia; and, unfortunately, to a much more distressing extent than it is in Pennsylvania As a result of the most recent and outrageous decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission West Virginia, Virginia, and Kentucky pay 45 cents more than Pennsylvania pays for the transportation of a ton of coal to Lake Erie ports.

West Virginia coal operators pay 48 cents more than Ohio No. 8 and Cambridge districts pay for the transportation of a ton of coal to the Lakes.

For 10 years prior to the 10th day of August, 1927, West Virginia and Kentucky operators paid 25 cents a ton more freight on their high-volatile coal, and West Virginia paid 40 cents a ton more freight on her smokeless coal to Lake Erie ports than Pennsylvania paid. During these 10 years Ohio No. 8 and the Cambridge districts enjoyed, over West Virginia and Kentucky, a handicap freight rate to the Lakes which was 3 cents a ton greater than the handicap granted to Pennsylvania by the Interstate Commerce Commission. By virtue of an order issued by the commission the railroads serving the eastern Ohio and western Pennsylvania districts were required to lower their freight rates 20 cents a ton on lake cargo coal for the benefit of these districts.

About the 1st of August, 1927—on or before the 10th of August, 1927—the Chesapeake & Ohio, Norfolk & Western, Louisville & Nashville, and the Southern Railroads duly announced that they would voluntarily reduce their freight rates on soft coal from the southern districts to Lake Erie ports 20 cents a ton in order to meet the enforced reduction in favor of Pennsylvania and Ohio.

This voluntarily proposed reduction of rates in favor of West Virginia and the other southern coal-producing States the Interstate Commerce Commission unceremoniously suspended, or, in other words, compelled the four railroads just mentioned to charge 20 cents a ton more freight than they asked on West Virginia, Kentucky, and Virginia coal that is shipped to the Lakes. The net result of all of which is an enforced freight-rate reduction of 20 cents a ton in favor of Pennsylvania and Ohio and an enforced suspension of a similar reduction voluntarily made in favor of West Virginia, Kentucky, and Virginia, for which the Interstate Commerce Commission is exclusively to blame. A majority of this commission, unmindful of their duty to the entire country, have constituted themselves champions of Pennsylvania's undertaking to monopolize the bituminous-coal business of the United States. They say to the railroads, in effect, "You shall not reduce your rates on Virginia,

West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee coal, because you would thereby interfere with the monopolistic schemes of the coal operators of the State of Pennsylvania.

Strange to say, Mr. Esch, on the eve of his reappointment to membership on the commission, changed his position on this very important lake cargo freight-rate question, and for the first time yielded to Pennsylvania's clamor for a monopoly of the coal business in the Northwest. In the light of Mr. Esch's previous record, I am compelled to believe that his desire for reappointment either consciously or unconsciously influenced his vote in this case.

Fortunately the Senate will soon have an opportunity to ascertain Mr. Esch's reasons for having assisted in outraging Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee in order to create an indefensible monopoly for Pennsylvania.

The southern coal operators have learned in the merciless school of bitter experience to understand a complaint such as the Senator has made against burdensome freight rates, but they will scarcely be able to forget the grievous afflictions which they are suffering at the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission long enough to pity the producers of Pennsylvania who have become the beneficiaries of the commission's most affectionate and paternalistic solicitude.

The Senator from Pennsylvania should not complain of freight rates. On the contrary, he should rejoice over the fact that his State and the State of Ohio have succeeded in coercing the Interstate Commerce Commission to decide every rate case in their favor regardless of consequences to the rest of the country.

I also understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to say that the operators of his State are now producing coal with union labor or under union conditions.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Substantially, that is true.

Mr. NEELY. I ask the Senator if the Pittsburgh Coal Co., the greatest coal company of the Senator's State, and one of the greatest in the world, is not operating wholly "nonunion" at the present time, and if it has not been operating "nonunion" exclusively for many, many months?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes; of course, that is so, and everybody knows it. Throughout the bituminous region there is a very large strike on, so that there is no great amount of union production at the present time, and those companies which are operating are trying to operate nonunion in many cases. That is true.

Mr. NEELY. In fact all of the large coal companies in the Pittsburgh region are operating under nonunion conditions, are they not?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely; while through the anthracite region it is quite the other way, and there are no nonunion operations.

Mr. NEELY. The anthracite region is not in question. It is not involved in the resolution of the distinguished Senator from California.

In view of the fact that anthracite coal is produced only in Pennsylvania and that its producers are free from competition, it would be quite remarkable if the anthracite industry were not thoroughly unionized.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The whole purpose of my statement, if the Senator pleases, was that the wage scales prevailing in Pennsylvania are, I believe, higher than those in the competitive districts. I think that is true.

Mr. NEELY. I have been informed by persons who ought to know that the scale of wages now prevailing in western Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio is similar to that which prevails in Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

Mr. GLASS. In any event, may I ask the Senator from West Virginia if it is the proper function of Congress to adjust wage scales? Is that the purpose of the investigation?

Mr. NEELY. Certainly Congress has no authority to equalize the wages that are paid by the proprietors of private industries, and the pending resolution invokes no action relative to this matter. But regardless of the purpose of the proposed investigation I do fervently hope that it will be productive of great benefit to every distressed coal miner and every embarrassed coal operator in the land; and that the investigating committee may succeed in evolving a practical plan for the rehabilitation of the entire coal industry, the prosperity of which is directly or indirectly of vital importance to every man and woman and child.

Mr. WILLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Have I lost the floor again?

Mr. NEELY. I apologize to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I have had the floor off and on several times and have not finished a sentence yet. Through my kindness of heart I always yielded when a Senator wanted to make a speech. Under the rule I understand we are not allowed to speak more than twice on the same day on the same bill or on the same question, and since technically I have had the floor three different times this morning and lost it every time by some Senator just taking it away from me, I suppose that technically I am not entitled to the floor again. I want to submit, if the Senator from Ohio will permit me, a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent, notwithstanding I have ignorantly lost all my rights, that when all the other Senators who want to talk get through that I may have the floor. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is entitled to the floor at this time if he wishes it.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a brief statement?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not think the present moment is opportune for a discussion of matters which are now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. I regret that the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] has felt called upon in this forum to indulge in the discussion of a matter judicial in character and which is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. My own view of the propriety of government and my understanding of the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission are such as to make me believe that it is, to say the least, indelicate to indulge in discussions here of matters which are now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and therefore, while I should feel strongly inclined to controvert some of the suggestions made by the Senator from West Virginia, I shall not indulge in that discussion at this time.

I want to say further that I think the criticism leveled at Mr. Esch was hardly worthy of my friend the Senator from West Virginia, who always aims to be fair. I think that, while there may be difference of opinion as to the wisdom of Mr. Esch's decision upon this or any other matter, there can be no question as to his integrity, and the suggestion that he was influenced by anybody to reach a certain decision is, as I believe, entirely unworthy.

Because I think this is not the proper time for a discussion of these matters I yield the floor, but at the proper time I shall want to say something about the suggestions made relative to those matters now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator tell the Senate whether he is for or against the resolution which he has been discussing?

Mr. WILLIS. I am for it. I did not mean to leave any other impression. I was responding as best I might to the suggestions made by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, I report an amendment to the pending resolution from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, the amendment being on page 2, line 18, after the word "witnesses," to insert:

to administer oaths and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words, to report such hearings as may be had in pursuance of the purposes hereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment now reported by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to discuss the resolution. I hope I shall not be out of order in doing that. I undertook to make a little explanation an hour or so ago on an interruption of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who, I think, misconceived the conditions which apply to the resolution. The conditions that brought about the introduction of the resolution, I think, and which in my judgment justify its passage, are conditions which, at least to a great extent, if not entirely, came about from the issuing of an injunction by a Federal judge in a Federal court. Because the difficulty has come about from an injunction that was issued from a Federal court, it therefore is a proper matter for investigation, I should think, by the Senate, being a part of the Federal Government. It is not a State injunction that is involved.

The people who are driven out of their homes and are living in barracks, where all this suffering takes place, are living there because of an injunction which is now the subject of consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary upon a bill now before that committee proposing to curtail the issuing of injunctions by Federal judges and Federal courts. Therefore, it seems to me that it is perfectly proper for the Federal Government, through any instrumentality under its control, to investigate the question.

Indeed, it was the intention of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary investigating the matter to apply to the Senate for authority to go to Pittsburgh and make an examination of conditions. I doubt very much whether we shall do that if the resolution now before the Senate is passed, as I assume it will be, because then a subcommittee from the Interstate Commerce Committee will go and make the investigation and we shall perhaps rely on their report for the facts, if we want to use them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska in what State the injunction was issued?

Mr. NORRIS. In Pennsylvania.

Mr. KING. That is what I understood.

Mr. NORRIS. The Judiciary Committee have not finished their hearings. They have only heard one side of the question. I would not presume to state anything about the facts, and I would not discuss them if it had not been that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who is personally acquainted with the situation, has described in some detail the conditions existing there. I think it is without question a very deplorable condition, whatever the cause may be determined to have been.

I feel that some of the Senators here have changed base since yesterday. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], who, I am sorry, has left the Chamber—and yet I can not blame him very much because he knew I was going to take the floor—is consistent to-day with his conduct of yesterday. He did not want a committee of the Senate appointed yesterday to investigate anything pertaining to legislation, and he is against such action to-day. I thought he was wrong yesterday. I think he is wrong to-day, although I have to concede that in the judgment of the Senate he is right and I am wrong.

That can not be said of the chairman of the great Committee on Interstate Commerce, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. I am sorry he has left the Chamber, too. He is inconsistent to-day with the attitude he took yesterday, when he was opposed to a committee of the Senate gathering information for the purpose of legislation, while to-day he is in favor of it. We converted him evidently in the arguments yesterday, but the conversion did not come until after the Senate adjourned, and consequently we did not get his vote and we did not get the wonderful influence of his power here, or we would have won yesterday instead of getting licked. I feel that if we should have had a reconsideration of the vote yesterday since we now have with us the great Senator from Indiana, we could have done yesterday just what we are going to do to-day—appoint a Senate committee to gather some evidence for the purpose of enlightening the Senate in regard to legislation.

I did not know that this was coming up, but after the vote on yesterday I thought perhaps the Judiciary Committee was going to block any further consideration of the injunction bill, because I felt as though the Senate had established the precedent that none of its committees had any authority or any jurisdiction or any right to undertake an investigation for the purpose of determining whether we ought to have any legislation; and if so, what kind we ought to have. We shall reverse ourselves to-day under the influence, control, and leadership of the great Senator from Indiana, and we shall send his committee up there to gather evidence, and shall be able to legislate wisely and patriotically in due time.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DENEEN] offered an amendment a moment ago, which the clerk will read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Illinois, on behalf of the committee, offers the following amendment: On page 2, line 18, after the word "witnesses," to insert:

to administer oaths and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words, to report such hearings as may be had in pursuance of the purposes hereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania will now be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Pennsylvania offers the following amendment: On page 2, after line 9, to insert:

Said committee or subcommittee shall also investigate the existing rate structure of freight rates on bituminous coal, to determine whether there exist injustices and unfairness therein and whether any mining districts have been unfairly and abnormally stimulated and overdeveloped thereby.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the situation in Pennsylvania and in other mining States were not so serious and the suffering so great, I should think that we might spend an hour laughing at the Senators from coal States who are so solicitous now that something should be done. This morning the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], with tears in his voice, talked about the suffering in his State; the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is much concerned now over what is going to happen in the coal business; but two years ago, when there was suffering in my State and the people there were deprived of coal, I did not find any tears in the voices of Senators from the soft-coal States, neither did I find any sympathy in their hearts.

Mr. President, there can be no doubt that there is great suffering in the coal fields of Pennsylvania. As I said the other day, within an hour by airplane of this Capitol, women and children are suffering and deaths are occurring by reason of deprivations.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. COPELAND. For a question only, please.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator from New York says that he found no sympathy in our hearts a year or two ago when he was trying to secure the passage of his coal bill. I want the Senator to tell us what diagnosis he made to determine that condition by virtue of which he ascertained a lack of sympathy on the part of those of us who come from coal-producing States?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the physician has learned to gain much knowledge by observation, and I had the opportunity time after time to observe the unwillingness and to witness the inactivity of the Senators from those States.

I am not going to become involved in any new controversy with the Senator from West Virginia. He has made his speech and when I get through with mine he may make another one; but I have some things to say about this resolution.

Mr. President, I desire to say, first to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] that when we deal with the sufferings, the misery, and the unhappiness in the homes of the coal miners, after all, we are dealing with effects, with results. I want to ask the Senator from California if he thinks that his resolution goes far enough to reach the causes of this suffering? The only thing I can find in the resolution which seeks to locate the causes is in the third line on the second page.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that accomplishes the purpose.

Mr. COPELAND. The resolution there reads:

and the reasons for conditions and happenings therein.

Does the Senator think, if that language be adopted, that it will enable the committee to ascertain all the factors which enter into the causes of this serious situation in the coal industry?

Mr. JOHNSON. Those words were inserted purposely in order that every contributing cause might under the circumstances be developed. I can say to the Senator from New York very frankly that I have not any doubt, if there is any single cause or any number of causes contributing to those conditions and happenings in the coal fields, the committee will have a perfect right under that language to develop them.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator, after the committee has ascertained all the facts and reached its conclusion, will the committee then feel free to recommend any measures of relief which may be necessary?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is my assumption.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very glad to have the Senator's opinion to that effect, but I want to make sure, Mr. President, that that is the case, because there is a very serious situation here. I do not need to be reminded by the Senators from the coal States about the dreadful plight of the coal industry; there is not any question about it. I am speaking now of the industry as a business; not of the industry in relation to labor and the sufferings of the miners and their families in the mining towns, but the industry itself. It is absolutely on the rocks. There have been employed the most short-sighted policies in the conduct of this industry. It is amazing to me to think that the men who control the industry—and as I have met them they appear to be wise and big business men—have not shown a grain of common sense in the conduct of the coal business, but have permitted it to drift along until now the industry is all but bankrupt. If it were an industry engaged in the development of some product which was a luxury, its condition would not be of any concern to the Congress, but there can be no happiness in this country unless we have an unfailing supply of coal.

We must have the coal to run our factories; we can not have employment in the cities unless we have coal to run the factories; we must have coal for every purpose having to do with the industrial life of our country. So it is a matter of vital importance that we do not direct the committee to go ahead without wide authority. It would be a pity if it shall be determined at the end of the investigation that the committee is powerless, because it has authority to deal merely with intrastate matters.

The things that are happening in Pennsylvania are terrible. It is outrageous the way the private police treat the poor miners and their families there. It is a heartless and wicked thing the way the owners of the mines have dispossessed the miners, have put them out of comfortable cottages, thrown them into the street, and have not waited even for them to build barracks where they might go and take care of the babies; and babies have been born in the streets. It is an outrage, but unfortunately that particular phase of it is not a thing with which Congress can deal. That is a problem for the State of Pennsylvania and for the localities where the mines are situated. However, there is a larger problem, Mr. President, and that is the problem of the causes of this disastrous state of affairs and those causes we must seek.

I heard this morning the appeal from the Senator from Pennsylvania, an appeal that struck home to me. I do not want to hold myself as being holier or more sympathetic than is the Senator from Pennsylvania, but he did not respond to my appeal two years ago when the people of my city and of my State and in my section of the United States were suffering. There was not any response then.

But, Mr. President, we must go forward in this matter. We must ascertain how there can come about an economic situation which will permit people to suffer, to be deprived of employment, and cause women and children actually to suffer for want of food and to die from exposure.

The causes are not hard to find. Of course it is true that by reason of the World War and the demand at that time for fuel mines were opened by the hundreds. I suppose it is safe to say that we have to-day three or four thousand more coal mines than we need; and with the opening of every mine came the engagement of men as miners. Now, with no demand abroad for coal and with only our own people to serve, we find ourselves with three or four thousand more coal mines than we need, and a quarter of a million miners have no work.

Last year the mines of this country produced almost a maximum coal supply—almost as much as they had produced at any time—yet 250,000 miners were without work and three or four thousand mines have been closed.

It would not be worth while, I will say to the able and kind-hearted Senator from California, sad as it is, for the Senate to inquire merely into the physical conditions surrounding these suffering people in Pennsylvania. So unless the committee is determined to go to the root of the trouble and find the causes for the effects which we are witnessing the inquiry will be a failure.

I wish to say that my study of this question through two or three years has convinced me that it is a tremendous problem. The committee will have no easy task, but if it shall find a way to solve the problem, to restore the coal industry to economic prosperity, and to direct into other channels of activity the 250,000 surplus miners, then it will deserve a monument at the hands of the American people.

But, Mr. President, I appeal to the Senator from California to make sure that the wording of this resolution is sufficient. I had thought to add at the end of the ninth line on the second page language such as this:

> Also to ascertain all the factors which enter into the creation of this serious situation in the coal industry and to recommend measures for permanent relief.

If the Senator from California assures me that the language in the third line on the second page, "and the reasons for the conditions and happenings therein," is sufficient, I am satisfied; but I want to have the language sufficiently broad and the power conferred upon the committee sufficiently ample so that there shall be no doubt that the committee can go to the root of the trouble. It must ascertain what is wrong with this dying industry, in order that there may be restoration of economic prosperity in the coal industry so that we may no longer be embarrassed as we have been and may no longer suffer in our hearts by reason of the happenings in the mining communities.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Senator from New York and I seek to obtain exactly the same end. I am of the opinion that the language in the resolution is sufficient for that purpose. If there be the slightest doubt about it, I would not hesitate to accept the language that is suggested by the Senator from New York and to add it thereto; and if he feels any doubt on that score I would not object to adding the words that he has suggested as an amendment.

The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] suggests that the Senator's language is a limitation, while mine is quite the reverse.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely.

Mr. JOHNSON. The fact of the matter is, I personally inserted those eight words with the idea in mind that they would permit the development of anything that had occurred in the coal fields, any reason, any contributing cause in relation to the conditions, so that in my own mind I am very clear; but I want to have the matter very clear to others, too, because I quite agree with the Senator from New York that it would be useless merely to demonstrate the distress and the privation and the want and the hunger and the like. We want to go further. We want to show the causes for the present situation of the industry, as well as the causes that contributed to the want and the privation; and we wish above all things, having developed both and shown the causes, to present some constructive suggestion that may remedy the situation.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. We do know the symptoms; we know the effects; we know the results, but we must find the causes.

The Senator from Utah, with his long experience here, knows far better than I do, and I ask him, is it his conviction that the language on the third line will make it possible for the committee to go the very limit in ascertaining the causes of the trouble?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it in my mind; and not only that, but if anything develops in the hearing in the most remote way affecting the industry, they have full power to go to the limit, under the wording of the resolution.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. My purpose in rising to speak was to "dye in the wool" this project, to make certain that the committee has the power and to have the Senate understand thoroughly that that is what we expect of the committee, and not have somebody after a while say, "Oh, well, it was never expected that the committee would go that far." The coal industry has been very touchy. Whenever any proposal has been made to investigate it in any way, or to suggest legislation, a dozen Senators in this body have been on their feet at once to say, "You must not do that. We do not want to be interfered with."

I want to make sure what is the sentiment of the Senate. I want it thoroughly understood that this investigation is to go to the heart of the problem, that we are to know what it is that is wrong, and what it is that must be done to remedy the situation.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as already indicated, I have no objection whatever to the resolution as presented by the Senator from California; but now the Senator from Pennsylvania has presented an amendment in the nature of an addition to the resolution, and to that I am utterly opposed. It reveals the purpose of the Senator from Pennsylvania to renew and pursue here a bitterly controversial question.

Is it proposed, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Congress of the United States shall assume the railroad rate-making power which it has already committed to the Interstate Commerce Commission? If that is not the purpose of his inquiry, I should like to know what it is. Is it not the purpose to transfer the wretchedness and the misery which he has depicted to the Senate from the coal districts of Pennsylvania to those of Virginia and Tennessee and Kentucky and other States?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, is the Senator addressing me or the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GLASS. I am addressing my inquiry to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what I thought. Pardon me.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator prefer that I answer him as he goes along or that I wait until he finishes?

Mr. GLASS. Just as the Senator himself may prefer.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I should like to say, then, if the Senator will permit me, that of course I do not propose to transfer the misery that exists in Pennsylvania to any other district. I have nothing like that in mind; nor do I propose that the Senate shall make freight rates. All I ask is that this unending disagreement, in which the eloquent Senator from Virginia so well represents one side——

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator will please not say that I am eloquent, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And in which I so feebly represent the other, may be inquired into by some disinterested Senators who view it impartially.

We are constantly hearing criticism on this floor of the Interstate Commerce Commission and its function. The Senate has heard it from me in the past. We heard it this morning from my friend from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. All I want is that this committee, after it has investigated the matters that the Senator from California has in mind, after it has investigated this acute distress, shall then, having made its report on those things, go on and study with calmness and deliberation this immense conflict which has been waged for so many years between these two districts, and give us some impartial opinion on it and the means for its remedy, because it is against all reason that one part of the United States should be in perpetual warfare against another; and the Senator and I both know that that is the fact.

Mr. GLASS. No; I do not know that that is the fact, Mr. President. On the contrary, I know that for nearly 20 years the coal fields of one section submitted without a murmur to discriminating rates, differential after differential, increasing gradually until they became almost intolerable. They submitted without a murmur upon the assumption that the Interstate Commerce Commission judicially and fairly was making these differentials in pursuance of its duty to adjust transportation rates in a scientific way with respect to their compensatory nature.

After this long period of endurance without a murmur from any Senator or Representative from that section of the country, at last, when the Interstate Commerce Commission balked at a continuance of this oppression and refused to increase its differential, we found an outcry from the section represented by the Senator from Pennsylvania that assumed the most extraordinary aspect of anything that has ever happened within my recollection as a public man; and now the Senator is projecting this very controversy here in a proposed amendment to the pending resolution which assumes that the Congress of the United States possesses the rate-making power or will possess the rate-making power in legislation to follow the investigation proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Is it not axiomatic that the Congress does possess the rate-making power, and that the only reason why the Interstate Commerce Commission has that authority is that we have delegated to it that portion of our legislative power?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I should say that Congress possesses the rate-making power, and I should think the Senator from Pennsylvania would concede that the Congress itself determined that it was impracticable for Congress to exercise the rate-making power, and hence it delegated it to the Interstate Commerce Commission; and now the Senator is proposing to transfer one item of that rate-making power from the Interstate Commerce Commission presumptively to the Senate again because he is dissatisfied with it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I had no opportunity to take up with the Senator from Virginia, as I did with his associates from West Virginia and Kentucky, Mr. NEELY and Mr. SACKETT, a modification of this amendment; but we have worked out a modification that appears to be reasonably satisfactory to everybody, and I think is clearly impartial and will not interfere with the investigation of the primary subjects intended by the resolution.

The modified amendment would read:

> Said committee or such subcommittee shall also, after having made its report on the foregoing matter, investigate the existing rate structure of freight rates on bituminous coal, to determine whether there exist injustices and unfairness therein, and whether any mining districts are being unfairly and abnormally stimulated and overdeveloped or are being depressed thereby.

It seemed to them, and it does to me, that that was about as impartial a way of stating it as we could do, and that it would not in any event interfere with the immediate examination of the questions that the proponents of the resolution had in mind.

Mr. GLASS. Does not the Senator perceive that that is a proposition to transfer from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Senate itself the determination of the very question in controversy? Otherwise his resolution is perfectly futile and meaningless.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I do not propose that we shall assume the rate-making power.

Mr. GLASS. Is it the purpose, then, for the Senate to undertake to instruct the Interstate Commerce Commission to exercise its rate-making power as delegated by Congress in a way to meet the view of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course not. But here are millions of people, citizens of this country, who say that the Interstate Commerce Commission has sanctioned a rate structure that works unfairly to them. It is not a question of a particular rate, it is not a question of correcting a particular rate, but the people in Virginia say to that commission and to the world in general that they have been unfairly treated, the people in Pennsylvania say the same thing, and there are millions of people interested in this. Are we to ignore it in the Senate except in desultory talk?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania was engaged in conversation a while ago, and he did not hear my statement that the people of Virginia for a period of nearly 20 years submitted without a single murmur through their representatives here or in the other branch of Congress to the rate-making adjustments of the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon the assumption that those adjustments were based upon a scientific determination of railroad rates with reference to the compensatory nature of those rates.

I challenge the Senator to show that a representative from Virginia, or any one of these coal fields affected by his proposition, ever uttered one word of condemnation or remonstrance when those differentials were being fixed. It was not until the Interstate Commerce Commission in its judgment refused to raise the differentials to an extortionate rate, to a rate that meant disaster to these other coal fields, that the Senator from Pennsylvania himself assailed the commission, and held up the confirmation of a nominee who had participated in that view of the question on the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, I am sorry to note that the Senator is trying to transfer that controversy again to the floor of the Senate, and to commit to a Senate committee a proposition which in the circumstances it has not proper jurisdiction, and the only meaning of which is that he is proposing that the Senate or the Congress may assume jurisdiction of this rate and either by resolution or advice or by statute require the Interstate Commerce Commission to so adjust rates as to meet the situation as the Senator sees it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator approve the first part of the resolution, which would call for an examination of the actions of the Federal court in issuing an injunction in this case?

Mr. GLASS. I am much more disposed to take the view expressed by the junior Senator from Utah, that the great State of Pennsylvania itself ought to be able to take care of the situation, but since it has gotten into the Federal court I raise no objection to the resolution as presented by the Senator from California.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The great State of Pennsylvania could not do much with the actions of Federal courts. If the Senator approves the Senate finding out the facts which underlie the judicial decree in that injunction suit, how can he consistently resist our effort to find out the facts which lie behind the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission that have spelled disaster to whole communities?

Mr. GLASS. I think they are two entirely different propositions, distinctive, without relation one to the other. The inquiry here is as to whether a Federal court has abused its proper functions in issuing injunctions in a coal-mine strike.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. A Federal court, sanctioned by the Constitution, is a totally different department of the Government, and the Senator would have the Senate go and investigate that—and I agree with him that it should—but he would not have them investigate the creature of Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to ask him whether or not it is his claim that this question of freight rates constitutes a contributing cause to the distressing conditions which the resolution undertakes to investigate.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Our people in Pennsylvania think it is the principal cause, and they think that an investigation which is not permitted to go into that question goes in with one eye blind. I can not see why the Senator from Virginia should be so anxious to prevent the Senate from having the facts if he is so sure that he is right.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am not at all anxious to prevent the Senate from having any facts upon which the Senate is authorized to act. I simply do not desire to complicate the resolution of the Senator from California with a bitterly controverted proposition, the real purpose of which, disguise it as one may, is to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to exercise powers which Congress itself does not possess, and which the Congress may not lawfully delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission, to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to say whether it may not use its rate-making power as a cudgel to the operators of any industry in this country, or to the owner of any commercial enterprise, to put them under the ban of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to say to them, "Unless you are willing to conduct your business thus and so, this way or that way, we will penalize you by raising your railroad rates."

I say that it is a monstrous proposition. I say that it is a usurpation of power, which is already occurring, to which the Congress should put an end, and it will not put an end to it by introducing this controversial question here at this time and in this way.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator wants Congress to put an end to what has been done by the commission, and yet he is not willing that we should have the facts upon which to act.

Mr. GLASS. We have an abundance of facts. As a matter of fact, the Interstate Commerce Commission has scarcely closed its doors upon an exhaustive investigation of railroad rates in this particular field. The Senator knows that. We do not lack any information upon the subject. We are perfectly aware of what has happened, and the most pregnant thing which has happened of all the happenings is the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has been guilty of a monstrous usurpation of power, a perversion of the rate-making scheme committed to its administration.

I hope the Senator will withdraw his amendment. If he wants to enter upon this controversy in the Senate, let him do it as a separate proposition and not fasten it as a rider upon the comparatively unobjectionable resolution offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, within my rights to perfect the amendment, I want to modify it to read in accordance with our agreement, as follows.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to insert, on page 2, after line 9, the following paragraph:

> Said committee or such subcommittee shall also, after having made its report on the foregoing matter, investigate the existing rate structure of freight rates on bituminous coal, to determine whether there exist injustices and unfairness therein, and whether any mining districts are being unfairly and abnormally stimulated and overdeveloped or are being depressed thereby.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, I do not like to see this amendment put upon the resolution now pending, and for very definite reasons.

I am anxious to see this resolution carried through and a proper investigation made of the serious condition that exists in the coal fields referred to or in any other fields. But as far as this amendment goes, if it should be determined by the Senate that a very much wider margin of railroad rates between the coal fields to which it refers were warranted, or that the rates from Pittsburgh should be further reduced, that fact would not in any particular help solve the difficulty under which the people in Pennsylvania now live. The situation there is the result of a strike, of an effort of the union to control, or of operators to get rid of the union, and however much business the operators there could gain under a change of freight rates, that strike would still continue and the misery of the people remain until one or the other side was defeated. In that sense this amendment is not germane to the resolution before the Senate.

As to an investigation of the effect of the freight rates and the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the southern coal fields or upon the Pennsylvania coal fields, I would welcome it. I know that it will show that there has been made an attempt to shift the burden of unemployment from one section of the country to another, to develop abnormally one section of the country and retard the development of another section of the country.

Under any fair resolution that can be proposed—and in terms this one as offered seems to me now to be getting into a fair form—I would assist a separate resolution by going before the Interstate Commerce Committee. But there are various questions connected with the investigation that is proposed in this amendment which I feel are of such a serious nature that it ought not to be passed in open session without having been discussed in the committee, and there never has been any open discussion of this amendment in the committee.

One of the things to which I refer is the point raised by the Senator from Virginia, that if an investigation shall be made it should be made for the purpose of affording a basis for new legislation. If such new legislation requires the change of railroad rates in order to effect justice between the districts, the Senate is committing itself to overriding the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think that is a matter which the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce ought to consider seriously and that they ought to consider also seriously the exact and fair wording of the amendment, which is very difficult for the Senate as a whole to do in open session.

An investigation of the great questions that are raised by this amendment would be a matter of tremendous expense. The coal organizations of both fields that are here involved have been fighting this question before the Interstate Commerce Commission and have been gathering witnesses and evidence for many years past. It has been a terrific charge upon the industry in both sections. If the additional charge of a further investigation before a Senate committee can be avoided, naturally it would tend to economy in the production of coal.

I feel, therefore, that I want to say to the Senate that if the Senate committee believes that a Senate investigation can be valuable in its ultimate results I will join, as a representative of the State of Kentucky, with the Senator from Pennsylvania in perfecting a resolution which will bring about an investigation that shall be fair and equal on all sides. But I do feel that without the proposition having run the gantlet of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on the question as to whether such an investigation is wise, as to whether the results to be obtained from such an investigation would be helpful and afford a basis for legislation, it is one that should cause the Senate to pause and consider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 7201, the Alien Property Custodian bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside for not to exceed 30 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is laid aside for not to exceed 30 minutes.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, I would like to say a word or two more.

Mr. SWANSON. Do I understand that the unfinished business is laid aside for 20 minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; the Senator from Utah asked unanimous consent to lay it aside for not to exceed 30 minutes.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to laying it aside without any specific limitation.

Mr. JOHNSON. When the 30 minutes are up, if we have not disposed of the resolution I am going to ask that the unfinished business be laid aside for a further time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, one reason why I specified 30 minutes is because last week the alien property bill was laid before the Senate and made the unfinished business. I was assured on Monday that if I would consent fo lay it aside, the resolution, which we passed last night, would be passed in one day. Here it is Thursday and the unfinished business has not been considered for a minute. With the unfinished business laid aside indefinitely the pending resolution might take the remainder of the week, and I do not feel that I would be justified in consenting to lay aside the unfinished business further. I hope we can get through with the pending resolution in 30 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope so. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] agrees with me that we ought to conclude it in 30 minutes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think we can finish it in 15 minutes. I should like to see it passed to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor and will proceed.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, the point I was making when the unfinished business was laid before the Senate was that the questions here involved, it seems to me, are of such moment that they ought to be considered by a regular committee of the Senate before they are acted on. The question that must be involved, if the Senate finds that the rates as between districts are unjust, has been argued in the Senate on numerous occasions. One of the last arguments that I remember was presented by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING], in which he sought to demonstrate the advisability of a change in the rule of the long-and-short-haul clause. I listened to the arguments that were made here that such change of rates be made by congressional action, which, in my opinion, was contrary to the entire theory of rate making when that prerogative was turned over to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

If it was true in that case, it is true in this case. Therefore, a great principle of the whole method of rail rate making in the country is involved in the adoption of the pending amendment to the resolution.

I speak to the Senate in agreement that if the Senate thinks it is wise, after consideration by the committee, that the Senate shall investigate and see whether legislation of this character is necessary, I as a Representative of one of the districts involved in the matter will gladly and willingly join with the Senator from Pennsylvania, because, as I said, I feel that the cause of my people is just and it will stand before any tribunal in the country. But I do object to having an amendment put on the pending resolution which has not been considered by the proper committee of the Senate when it involves the rate-making power directly by Congress, a question of such magnitude to the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I simply want to propound a question to the proponent of the resolution, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], as to whether he objects to the addition of the proposed amendment to his resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am very glad the question has been propounded. When the resolution first was introduced the Senator from Pennsylvania was sympathetic with it and suggested to me that he desired an amendment, which was substantially the amendment that he has offered to-day. I, knowing little of the proposition involved, told him that I would accept the amendment. Subsequently I learned, when the matter came before the Interstate Commerce Committee, that the amendment would give rise to very great discussion and controversy and might imperil the object I had in view in presenting the resolution. Thereupon I took the matter up with the Senator from Pennsylvania and explained to him the conditions which had arisen, and he very kindly said that he would leave to my discretion what should be done with the amendment.

I have not any objection to the amendment, unless the amendment is going to jeopardize and imperil the resolution and prevent the accomplishment of the purpose that is mine in introducing the resolution. Apparently, to-day, from what has been said by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], from what has been said by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT], and from what has been said by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], an interminable debate will arise upon this particular amendment. I do not want the resolution jeopardized or imperiled in any way. Delay ought not to occur in a matter of this sort of such great importance, and the resolution itself ought not to be imperiled by any amendment of any kind or character that is not directed to the immediate purpose of the resolution. That is my attitude.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I have already said that if the Senator from Pennsylvania wants to introduce a separate and distinct resolution to ascertain the facts, with a view to determining whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has properly exercised its functions or to have legislation to enlarge the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to vest it with the right of determining, not the adjustment of railroad rates but conditions of operation and so on, I shall not object to it; I shall be glad to vote for it. There is no concealment that I want to make of any fact involved in any investigation whatsoever.

Mr. JOHNSON. Inasmuch as the Senator from Pennsylvania is quite in accord with me in desiring the investigation, will he not accept what is suggested by the Senator from Virginia and withdraw the pending amendment which causes the controversy and the delay in the passage of the resolution?

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not see why we can not get a vote on the amendment within the next 15 minutes. The moment it is voted on the resolution will pass.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then let us vote on it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have taken the floor for a very brief statement. As I have already publicly stated, and I think also to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] in conversation, I am in entire sympathy with his resolution and will vote for it. But I am unable to understand why we should make two bites of the cherry, as it were. It seems to me the subject introduced in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania is decidedly germane. By his own explanation he makes it perfectly clear that much of the difficulty in the coal fields, as analyzed in the State of Pennsylvania, has arisen because of the difference in freight rates in transporting coal. I do not propose for a moment to discuss that proposition, its equity, or its fairness, but as the representative in part of one of the States in the Union not having any coal deposit, but being consumers, of course, as are the other 35 or 40 States of the Union which are noncoal-producing States, we have a decided interest in the freight rates. It naturally causes wonder as to why, in paying for a ton of coal, we pay just as much if it is hauled 150 miles as if it comes 300 miles.

It seems to me when a committee of the Senate is going into that district to investigate a rather comprehensive program such as is contained in the resolution of the Senator from California, it is only common business sense at the same time, by the same committee in the atmosphere, to get all the information that can be obtained which might directly or even indirectly apply to the prices of coal. I can see no reason in the world, especially when the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT], and other Senators all express their willingness that the investigation should be made, why we should subdivide it or why one should interfere with the other; in other words, why should 10 Members of the Senate be employed to inquire into a situation that five Members can readily investigate?

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator from New Jersey contend that it is the business of Congress or any other branch of the Government to determine transportation rates by the varied conditions in different coal fields? If it may do that with respect to coal, may it not do it with respect to any other industry or any other commercial enterprise?

Mr. EDGE. Exactly; but the Congress of the United States has provided legislation under which the rate-making powers and all other powers are delegated to the various commissions. It seems to me absolutely within the purview of a very proper investigation for the Senate of the United States to determine those underlying facts which go to help prepare or consider legislation.

Mr. GLASS. Does Congress itself possess or has it the right to delegate to any commission the power to say what may be the operating conditions in any industry in the country?

Mr. EDGE. Perhaps not directly that; but the Congress, it seems to me, should——

Mr. GLASS. Has Congress the right——

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator let me answer his question?

Mr. GLASS. The Senator can answer both questions in one word. Has Congress the right itself or has it the right to delegate to any commission the power to fix transportation rates——

Mr. EDGE. The rate-making power——

Mr. GLASS. To fix transportation rates with reference to the operating conditions that prevail in any industry or any commercial enterprise in the country?

Mr. EDGE. The Senator has asked me more or less a technical legal question, but I would say, from the standpoint of a layman, in a general way, that if the Congress of the United States, under the broad interpretation, as I understand it, of the decision of the Supreme Court, has the right to investigate almost any situation or condition in the country if it can be even indirectly related to the pertinency of legislation; it certainly has the right both morally and legally to ascertain, in the fields of Pennsylvania, Virginia, or any other State, the underlying condition.

Mr. GLASS. I am not talking about ascertainment; I am talking about what may be done constitutionally or legally after we have ascertained the facts. Does the Senator contend that the Congress of the United States has the power——

Mr. EDGE. To investigate; yes.

Mr. GLASS. I did not say investigate.

Mr. EDGE. That is all I am discussing.

Mr. GLASS. Why investigate if we do not contemplate legislation?

Mr. EDGE. I am assuming that that is what is contemplated.

Mr. GLASS. I am asking the Senator, after the investigation shall have been made, if ordered, has the Congress itself the constitutional right to so adjust transportation rates in the country as to affect operating conditions in any industry or any commercial enterprise?

Mr. EDGE. The Congress of the United States has the right to secure, and it is its duty to secure, all information of the kind pertinent to legislation.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator does not answer my question.

Mr. EDGE. I will answer the Senator's question, but I will answer it in my own way, and not in the way the Senator from Virginia would like me to answer it.

As to their direct power to actually fix rates; no. As to their power to secure all the information that may or may not be of help in revising powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; yes.

Mr. GLASS. I have not attempted to deny the latter proposition.

Mr. EDGE. Then we are not very far in disagreement.

Mr. GLASS. What then is the purpose of the investigation if it is not legislation or to obtain information upon which to base legislation?

Mr. EDGE. My latter answer was entirely upon the premise of information upon which to base legislation.

Mr. GLASS. But the second answer of the Senator shows how utterly futile the proposed investigation might be.

Mr. EDGE. That could only be discovered after the investigation was completed.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I am very much surprised at the position taken by some Senators on the other side of the aisle. I am satisfied that many of them who are contemplating voting for the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania are not acquainted with the situation.

There is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission a case in which the railroads have asked the privilege of reducing their rates to the extent that rates have been reduced on certain other railroads for the benefit of the coal mines of Pennsylvania and contiguous sections. The reduction in the rates referred to has increased by 20 cents a ton, the differential or benefit which those mines enjoy. The railroads that serve Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee have asked the privilege of a similar reduction. That case, as I have said, is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has refused permission to the railroads to put into effect the lower rates which are sought. That case will ultimately determine whether or not the new rates shall be allowed to go into effect. Yet the Senator from New Jersey, the Senator from Connecticut, and the distinguished and able lawyer from Pennsylvania are desirous of having Congress investigate a case that is pending in quasi judicial tribunal. I sat here for a long time and heard the roof of the Capitol almost blown off in denunciation of Congress daring to investigate any question concerning which or involved in which there was a case pending in the courts.

What is this proposition in a real common-sense way? There is pending a case as to whether certain railroads shall be permitted to put into effect the same reduction in rates that was accorded to other railroads. While that case is pending, is being heard and argued, it is proposed that the Senate shall by a committee proceed to investigate the question and have a report and recommendation submitted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that he disapproves an investigation of those matters which are pending in judicial tribunals?

Mr. SWANSON. I might say that the Senator has almost persuaded me that we ought never to do such a thing from the continual talk he has indulged in relative to similar matters.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I wonder whether I have not entirely persuaded the Senator to that effect?

Mr. SWANSON. With a case pending in the court, I do not think that the Senate ought to undertake an investigation with the view to making a report to influence the decision of that court.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Is the Senator going to vote for the resolution as it stands without my amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. I am not saying what I am going to do. I shall cross that bridge when I get to it, and I wish I could persuade the Senator from Pennsylvania to do the same thing.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator is now facing that very bridge, and I am wondering whether he is going to cross it.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not think the Senate should take such action as is proposed by the Senator's amendment when there is a case pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not think that it should appoint a committee to make a recommendation to do what the Senator has decided should be done in that case. The Senator can not advocate that, can he?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Senator is not going to vote for the resolution as presented by the Senator from California, then he is probably the only Member of the Senate who is going to vote against it. I call the Senator's attention to the fact, however, that the resolution as originally submitted empowers the committee to "ascertain whether in industrial disputes or strikes in said coal fields injunctions have been issued in violation of constitutional rights."

If it is commandment No. 1 in the Senator's decalogue that proceedings pending in court ought not to be inquired into, how can the Senator's conscience allow him to vote for that portion of the resolution?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I will answer that very quickly. The Senator admits that there is a specific case now pending, in which three railroads have asked to reduce their rates.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield to the Senator later. A specific case is pending, and the Senator asks for an investigation as to the specific question involved in that case. If a specific injunction were pending——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is.

Mr. SWANSON. As to that specific case, a different proposition would be involved. I have no objection to proceeding along the line of general principles, but the Senator endeavors to invoke the functions of a committee of the Senate to help him in a case that is pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. It does not turn on any broad principle; it merely involves the question whether the coal fields in Pennsylvania shall be developed or the coal fields elsewhere shall be developed, although the Pennsylvania coal under existing law already has a differential of more than 20 cents a ton, which is a great advantage.

What I object to is allowing this matter to be investigated, and a report made to be considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission, when a case on the very subject is pending before it. When the decision shall have been rendered if the opinion is adverse to the claims of the Senator from Pennsylvania, then I think it would be very proper to have an investigation. On the other hand, if it shall be decided adverse to the vast interests of Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee, we would ask for an investigation. Why? With a view of ascertaining whether or not the law ought to be amended, whether such authority and power ought to be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The commission might decide in this case that it has not the authority; that it is not the industrial master of the country; but I say, pending that decision, it is not proper and it is not right to employ the subterfuge of an investigation by the committee to influence the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator does not seem to have read my amendment; I do not think he has read the original resolution; and he certainly has not been listening to the debate; but otherwise he is fully equipped to condemn the proposition that I have proposed.

Mr. SWANSON. Perhaps I am suspicious of anything that the Senator from Pennsylvania may introduce in connection with coal.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I quite understand that.

Mr. SWANSON. It carries with it suspicion prima facie.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator would be surprised to learn, then, that this amendment seems to the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Kentucky to be entirely satisfactory; that it does not refer to any particular dispute; that it does not in any way imply any favoritism to Pennsylvania.

Mr. SWANSON. They have given sufficient reasons why it should not be adopted. I have other objections. I think, with the combination of objections urged by other Senators and the fact that there is a case pending, the committee ought not to make a report on the facts to be ascertained in this case. I have no objection when a decision shall have been reached, and when the decree shall have been entered, to having the question investigated; in fact, I shall then favor it; but at this time I think that the proposed action should not be taken. I do not know, really, what the purpose of the Senator is. He says he is in favor of the original proposition. I am willing to vote for it and have no objection to it, but I will tell you, Mr. President, there is a very fine way of killing a proposition by adding amendments to it. I have engaged in that kind of procedure myself, and I am afraid the Senator from Pennsylvania himself is an adept at it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Just before the Senator entered the Chamber the Senator's colleague said that he saw no objection to such an investigation as this if we would provide for it in a separate resolution. Which of the Senators represents the true thought of the great State of Virginia?

Mr. SWANSON. Virginia has two Senators; it is not like the State of Pennsylvania, which is dominated by a boss and which has only one. [Laughter.] Virginia sends two Senators here and not one, and they are not dominated by a boss.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course, there is such a thing as State rights in Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I repeat, we have two Senators and not one.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; but the State of Pennsylvania is not permitted to select more than one.

Mr. SWANSON. She does not need more than one when she has a boss, because they vote the same way.

Mr. President, in my opinion, the pending resolution should not have attached to it the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. In justice to the commission and what is being done there, I think the investigation proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania should not be made until the case pending there has been decided. When it shall have been decided, we shall know as to the industrial business of the entire United States, where coal may be mined, where it may be sold, where we shall have factories developed, and other industries in various sections. Those questions will be determined. If the commission shall say that it will be the industrial master of America, I think the law ought to be changed. The proper time to conduct such an investigation and to ascertain the facts will be when the commission has decided the case pending before it and defined what it thinks its authority is. Now is a very inopportune time.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator has now answered my question. He is going to vote for this resolution in spite of the fact——

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know whether I will vote for it if it shall be amended as the Senator seeks to amend it, but without his amendment I will vote for it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Even if it calls for an investigation of specific proceedings which are still under adjudication in the United States court?

Mr. SWANSON. As to whether coal shall be sold from Pittsburgh or sold from Virginia is more or less a local matter, but if the Senator's amendment were adopted it would be an effort to secure evidence and facts to help him in a case that is pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the power of the Senate ought not to be used for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the Senators will yield to me for just a moment, I wonder if they would do me the kindness to permit a vote on the pending amendment before the half hour to which the Senator from Utah referred shall have expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NEELY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this a call for a quorum or a yea-and-nay vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll is being called to ascertain the presence of a quorum, at the request of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I withdraw my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order of the lack of a quorum has been withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ASHURST responded in the negative when his name was called.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment may be stated.

Mr. SMOOT. The roll call has proceeded and the Senator from Arizona has answered to his name. Nothing can now be done but to continue the roll call.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, after line 9, it is proposed to insert:

Said committee or such subcommittee shall also, after having made its report on the foregoing matter, investigate the existing rate structure of freight rates on bituminous coal to determine whether there exist injustices and unfairness therein, and whether any mining districts are being unfairly and abnormally stimulated and overdeveloped or are being depressed thereby.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will resume calling the roll.

The roll call was continued.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

Mr. TYSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I transfer my pair with him to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BROUSSARD. My colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BROOKHART (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I am informed that he would vote the same way that I have voted, and therefore I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ASHURST. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are absent on important business; and that if present, they would severally vote "nay."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I will transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. BLAINE. My colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "nay" on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 60, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. REED of Pennsylvania was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am informed that there are no further speeches to be made upon the resolution. If that be the case, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of having a vote upon the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that a vote be had upon the resolution?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish the Senator from Utah would make his request so that we can hear him. For about ten times I have never been able to understand what he has asked. If he will speak a little louder, I shall appreciate it.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not talk against half a dozen Senators. My request was that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order to take a vote upon the pending resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended. The resolution, as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce or a subcommittee thereof be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed immediately to make a thorough and complete investigation of the conditions existing in the coal fields of central Pennsylvania, western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio; also to ascertain whether the railroad companies and their officials have been or are, by agreement or otherwise, endeavoring to depress the labor cost of coal produced by union mine labor; also whether in the said coal fields wage contracts have been abrogated or repudiated, whether defenseless men, women, and children, without cause, have been evicted from their homes, and generally what has transpired in the said coal fields, and the reasons for conditions and happenings therein; and in this connection the said committee or a subcommittee thereof shall ascertain whether in industrial disputes or strikes in said coal fields injunctions have been issued in violation of constitutional rights, and whether by injunction or otherwise the rights granted by the Constitution of the United States have been abrogated and denied.

The expenses of said committee or a subcommittee thereof hereunder, which shall not exceed $10,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. Upon the conclusion of its investigation the committee or a subcommittee thereof shall forthwith report to the Senate.

Said committee or a subcommittee thereof is hereby empowered to sit and act at such time or times and at such place or places as it may deem necessary; and to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words, to report such hearings as may be had in pursuance of the purposes hereof; and to require the production of books, papers, and documents, and to do such other acts as may be necessary in the matter of said investigation.

The chairman of the committee, or of a subcommittee thereof, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation hereby authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

RECENT DECISIONS OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I had intended to discuss a matter before the Senate this afternoon relating to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but the day is wearing on, and the bill which is the unfinished business is important, and I want it to have attention and the right of way. So I desire to give notice that on to-morrow, as soon as the routine morning business shall be disposed of, I will ask the attention of the Senate while I submit some remarks.

ALIEN PROPERTY AND OTHER CLAIMS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the Chair lays before the Senate House bill 7201, the Alien Property Custodian bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7201) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I assure Senators that I am going to speak only a few moments in explanation of the pending bill, known as the Alien Property Custodian bill. As I stated in reporting the bill, the report was made in such a way that every item in the bill and every amendment thereto was explained in the report. Therefore, what I have to say to-day will be just a short, further explanation of the object and purpose of the bill.

SETTLEMENT OF WAR CLAIMS BILL

Mr. President, I am very glad of the opportunity to proceed at the present time for prompt action by the Senate upon the settlement of the war claims bill. The legislation is of the utmost importance. There was almost unanimous agreement in the Finance Committee upon the provisions of the bill. In fact, I believe I am justified in stating that there was unanimous accord upon the general principles, and that the divergent views of one or two Senators were directed toward only a few provisions of the bill.

NECESSITY FOR THE LEGISLATION

A practical method must be found, without delay, for the payment of the claims of American nationals against Germany, amounting to more than $191,700,000, including interest to January 1, 1928 (excluding the claims of the United States on its own behalf, amounting to more than $62,200,000, including interest); for the payment by the United States of the amounts which it justly owes, and I may say has owed for several years, for private property which it took during the war, consisting of ships and patents and radio station; and for the return of property which was seized by the Alien Property Custodian during the war, and which is still held by him.

The existing situation demands immediate action. American claimants must be paid as soon as possible and as much as possible, for if nothing is done now they will not be paid within their lifetime. The owners of the property taken by the United States must be paid, for their debts are already long overdue. As much of the property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian as is possible should be returned at once.

A practical solution of the problems necessitates a certain departure from principles, a departure which under other circumstances might not be easy of justification. For example, as I have stated before, I, for one, would have been glad if all the alien property could have been returned years ago. We have probably retained it now for a longer period than American principles would permit, if that were the only problem involved. But we are not confronted with the sole question of the disposition of alien property. We must also recognize the necessity of adequately protecting the citizens of the United States who suffered losses by the acts of Germany during the World War. We have worked long and hard in an effort to determine upon practical methods which will be fair, equitable, and sound.

The committee report discusses in detail every provision of importance in the bill. This report has been available for several days. Accordingly it will not be necessary for me at this time to enter into a lengthy and technical discussion of the bill and its provisions. I trust that Senators interested in the bill will study the report carefully, for I believe they will find in it an answer to their questions. I will do no more at the present time than refer briefly to the bill and then explain the reasons which prompted the committee to reject many of the proposals made to it.

WHAT THE BILL WILL DO

The bill as reported by the Finance Committee will, briefly, accomplish the following:

First. All death and personal injury awards to American nationals (393 in number and aggregating more than $4,000,000) will be paid in full; all awards to American nationals not in excess of $100,000 will be paid in full (3,046 in number to date and aggregating more than $29,400,000).

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am interested in the claims of the estates of some of those who went down on the Lusitania.

Mr. SMOOT. They are all taken care of.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will any interest be paid?

Mr. SMOOT. Interest will be paid on all the claims of Americans in accordance with the awards made by the Mixed Claims Commission.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Can the Senator state from memory the number of claims of that class that will not be fully paid?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean over the $100,000?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. One hundred and seventy-eight claims. That is, there are 162 claims that have already been adjusted and there are 16 claims that have not been adjusted by the Mixed Claims Commission, which no doubt will be, and when those 16 have been adjusted then there will be 178 of them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. One hundred and seventy-eight in all?

Mr. SMOOT. One hundred and seventy-eight in all. Every claim will be paid with the exception of 178, and as to those 178 I will tell the Senator just exactly what they will amount to outside of the 16 that have not yet been adjusted.

The sum of $100,000 will be paid upon all the larger awards (162 in number, with about 16 still to be entered, and aggregating more than $158,000,000). These payments (amounting to more than $51,000,000) will be made as soon as the necessary administrative machinery can be set up. Practically all of them should be paid by September 1 of this year. The balance of the larger awards will be paid in future installments and an amount equal to 80 per cent of all the private awards (amounting to more than $153,400,000) will be paid, with interest, within six years.

Second. The claims against the United States will be adjudicated with an opportunity afforded the claimants and the United States to be heard and to present evidence. It should be possible to enter awards in most of the cases within two years. As soon as the awards are entered the claimants will receive 50 per cent of their award and the balance will be payable in future installments.

Mr. HOWELL. Is the Senator referring to ships?

Mr. SMOOT. Ships, and patents, and a radio station.

Mr. HOWELL. The ships have already been appraised at $34,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. That was right after we entered the war. I will reach that question.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator this question: As the Senator has said, the ships were appraised and their value ascertained at the time they were taken?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I think that was done by a naval board, when I was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, and they tried to fix a fair estimate. This bill provides for future appraisement of those ships?

Mr. SMOOT. Not to exceed $100,000,000.

Mr. SWANSON. Then this board will be authorized to increase this $34,000,000 to $100,000,000 if they see proper?

Mr. SMOOT. Interest upon the $35,000,000 would bring it up to about $50,000,000.

Mr. SWANSON. At what rate of interest?

Mr. SMOOT. At 5 per cent.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator know of any facts, any evidence, which would make these ships more valuable than they were at that time, when ships were in great demand?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will say that we had one of the parties who appraised the ships before the Finance Committee——

Mr. SWANSON. At what price has the Government been selling these ships?

Mr. SMOOT. Some of them have brought more than they were appraised for.

Mr. SWANSON. How many for less than they were appraised for?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not remember of any one being sold for less.

Mr. SWANSON. What have been the aggregate sales of these ships? What are the figures of their appraisement?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will find that in the report. I do not have the figures here now.

Mr. SWANSON. Did the committee discuss the question as to whether these ships really ought to be paid for under international law? Was that looked into?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about that.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator has a way of saying "There is no question about that."

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will wait, I will tell him why. There is no question that they should be paid for, under the attitude the Government of the United States has taken in relation to the returning of German property.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, the law with respect to ships is this: Of course, when a ship is in your harbor, under international law you have no right to capture it until you give it ample time to get out and escape any cruiser you might send out after it. As to these ships, it would have been a mere subterfuge to order them out of the harbors when the British fleet was lying in wait ready to capture them, and if they had gotten to Germany, Germany surrendered to the Allies all the ships they had above a certain tonnage.

I am willing to waive all question of international law and pay a fair and reasonable price for those ships, but I am not willing to pay any extravagant prices for the ships when I think it is almost a question of generosity on our part to settle for them at all.

Mr. SMOOT. The whole matter of returning a great deal of the property has been a matter of generosity on the part of the United States. All we are asking for now is $255,000,000 to pay the costs of the army of occupation in Germany after the war and to pay the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission.

Mr. SWANSON. No; we get a certain percentage out of the reparations to pay these debts.

Mr. SMOOT. Up to the present time we have received about $17,000,000 as payment of Army costs and, of course, that has been credited to the $255,000,000 for our army of occupation, and we have also received in addition $16,500,000 for the payment of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to ask the Senator another question. I have not had time to read the bill, but under it will the taxpayers of America be required to pay the obligations Germany owes us on account of injustices done our nationals? Will the taxpayers of America be called upon to pay?

Mr. SMOOT. There may be a loss to the taxpayers of America if we do not collect from Germany enough in the way of reparations to pay the expenses of the army of occupation, and whatever claims we have against Germany outside of that.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, is it not a fact that the maximum amount applicable to the payment of awards is $10,700,000?

Mr. SMOOT. I just said that the amount would be $10,700,000.

Mr. HOWELL. Is it not also a fact that if that $10,700,000 is paid in the ordinary way to pay these claims, it will take 80 years to pay the claims?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it would take approximately 61 years.

Mr. HOWELL. Under this bill the plan provides for paying these claims all within 39 years?

Mr. SMOOT. Twenty-six years, as I remember, exclusive of Government claims.

Mr. HOWELL. The Government claims will not be paid for 39 years?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. HOWELL. Fifty-three years; very well. It must be evident that if the Secretary of the Treasury states that $10,700,000 would not pay all these claims in 80 years, that if there is any plan whereby 61 per cent of American claims are paid within the next 2 or 3 years, and the balance of claims be paid within 26 years, and the total paid, as the Senator says, within 53 years, somebody is going to contribute.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this was not an individual war, it was not a corporation war; this was an American war, and if anybody is to lose any money, it is the American people. What I mean to say is that rather than an individual American, everybody was interested in it. As was so well said before the committee, the Government claims, under the plan we have, are put last. It will fall upon the taxpayers of the country, as far as that is concerned, pro rata if there is any loss.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not understand the Senator to advocate, do I, that the sinking of the Lusitania, killing American citizens——

Mr. SMOOT. That is all provided for.

Mr. SWANSON. Let me finish. You have provided for that?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. Is the American taxpayer ultimately to pay those claims?

Mr. SMOOT. No. We have the money now to pay all those claims.

Mr. SWANSON. Is the American taxpayer finally to pay, in taxes collected in the future, for what is paid out now? That is what I want to know.

Mr. SMOOT. We do pay, and properly so, for the ships we took, for the patents we took, and for the one radio station. Nothing else will be paid by the Treasury or borne by the taxpayers.

Mr. SWANSON. I am perfectly willing for the nationals of Germany to have the money due and the nationals of America who have claims against Germany to get together and fix up a fair settlement of these various claims. I am willing that a long time may be given. I am willing for America to advance a little money, and delay payment, and be generous about it, provided ultimately the American taxpayer shall not be taxed to pay for the derelictions of the German Government.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the ships and the radio station and the patents are concerned, those are to be paid by the Government. All the property that was seized of Germany and all of the losses of American individuals of every name and nature are to be paid under the provisions of the bill in effect out of moneys received from Germany. We retain 20 per cent of all the property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian and pay only 50 per cent of the payments for ships and patents and the radio station, and the remainder of the payments are to be made through the reparations.

I would like to have the Senator from Virginia follow the statement I make. I am not through yet.

Mr. SWANSON. As I said, I am willing to deal generously with these people. I think America ought to deal generously under these circumstances. If I am assured by the Senator, after an investigation by the members of the Finance Committee, that ultimately, if we collect the reparations from Germany, American taxpayers might be delayed, that some money might be advanced, but I am not willing that ultimately the taxpayers of America shall be taxed to pay debts which the German Government itself ought to pay.

Mr. SMOOT. If the reparations are paid by Germany, American taxpayers will not be called upon to pay those debts.

Mr. SWANSON. Then it will be left to us whether we will enforce and collect those reparations. Have I an absolute assurance from the Senator that he is satisfied that if Germany pays her reparations the American taxpayer will not be compelled to discharge the obligations of the Government of Germany to its nationals?

Mr. SMOOT. I will assure the Senator that will be the case if the reparations are paid.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think I have my speech prepared in consecutive order, so that any Senator who will follow it will know exactly what the divisions are and how the payments will be made. I would like to get through with it, and then any question that may be asked I shall be glad to answer if I can.

Mr. HOWELL. I simply want to add one thing in this connection, and that is that the United States Treasury will be the victim in connection with the payment of all these awards within the time specified, whether the 2¼ per cent Dawes annuities come to the United States or not, and that is all that is provided for in the payment of these awards.

Mr. SMOOT. If the payments continue as up to this time they will be paid in due time.

Third. Eighty per cent of the German property held by the Alien Property Custodian will be returned immediately, and the balance will be returned in future installments.

Fourth. All the property held by the Alien Property Custodian belonging to Austrian or Hungarian nationals will be returned in full as soon as their governments provide for the payment of their claims of American nationals against them; and the claims of their nationals against the United States will be adjudicated and paid in full.

NO BURDEN ON THE TREASURY

The above results are accomplished without drawing one cent from the Treasury of the United States, except for the payment of the debts which we justly owe. As a matter of fact, this amount is already well represented by assets held by the United States. We still have many of the ships; we have the proceeds derived from the sale of some of them; we have insurance moneys received in the case of some of the vessels which were lost or damaged; and we have the operating profits received by the United States during the war period. It might well be said then that we are providing merely for the distribution of assets now on hand, rather than providing for a new appropriation.

The payments to the United States on account of its army of occupation costs are not affected by the bill, but will continue to be received. Under the Paris agreement the United States is entitled to receive as reimbursement for its Army costs, as a prior charge, the sum of 55,000,000 gold marks per year, or approximately $13,100,000. For the information of the Senate, I might state that the total received from Germany up to January 31 of this year, as reimbursement of the cost of its army of occupation, was $16,889,975.74.

FINANCE COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The Finance Committee amendments are explained in detail in the committee report. It is not necessary, therefore, to discuss them at this time. However, a brief reference to the more important amendments may be justified.

(1) LATE CLAIMS

Many American nationals did not present their claims against Germany or German nationals to the Mixed Claims Commission within the six-month period specified in the exchange of notes at the time of signing the agreement. There are, roughly, about 5,000 claims which were filed too late, and I know of many others that have not yet been filed. Many of these, of course, involve postwar transactions and are not within the jurisdiction of the commission. Although there are a few fairly large claims, by far the great majority of them are small claims of individuals.

An amendment recommended by the committee requests the President to enter into negotiations with the German Government with a view to extending the time, so that claims may be filed before July 1, 1928. This provision, of course, relates only to those claims which would otherwise have been within the jurisdiction of the commission had they been presented within the period specified. The committee was unanimous in its belief that the six-month period was too short. I sincerely hope the amendment will be adopted and that the agreement will be entered into.

(2) THE AUSTRIAN AND HUNGARIAN SITUATION

The bill as it passed the House dealt only with claims of American nationals against Germany, of German nationals against the United States, and the return of the property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian. The work of the Tripartite Claims Commission, which has been engaged in the adjudication of claims of American nationals against Austria and Hungary, has now progressed to the point where we can now safely and adequately deal with the Austrian and Hungarian situation, and the committee has done so. Briefly, the amendments provide that the property held by the Alien Property Custodian, of Austrian and Hungarian nationals, will be returned in full immediately upon the deposit by these governments of amounts sufficient to pay the awards to American nationals against them, and that the claims of their nationals against the United States may be adjudicated and paid.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of making the point of no quorum? I desire to do that because, unfortunately, I was not able to attend the hearings before the Finance Committee on the alien property bill. The Committee on Commerce, which had in charge and which was investigating the question of flood control, met at 10 o'clock each day and the Committee on Finance met at 10 o'clock, and I, being deeply interested in the matter of flood control, elected to attend those hearings instead of the committee investigating the Alien Property Custodian fund. I notice that with the exception of one other member of the committee, the able junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], there is no member of the committee on the floor at this time. I would like to have a quorum for that reason.

Mr. SMOOT. All of them were here when I started, I will say to the Senator. I suppose their absence comes about from the fact that the report, which was made upon the bill, was made very carefully and went into the details of the bill very thoroughly. I am quite sure that every member of the committee knows just exactly what is in the report. If any Senator will take the report and the bill and study them just briefly, he can see everything in detail as to the amendments involved. It will not take me long to get through now.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that the agreement of the committee with respect to the matter was practically unanimous.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is to say, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I am advised, would not favor it, but with that exception the report was unanimous. There is some difference, however, between agreement to support a proposition and the report upon the action of the committee. I thought the other members of the committee might want to hear the report, which I understand has not been published and has probably not been submitted to the committee and has not been approved by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean the report?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; it has been submitted to the committee.

Mr. KING. It has been published, but not formally submitted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the report which the Senator is now making been submitted to the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. This is a statement I am making now. This is not the report.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator was reading the report.

Mr. SMOOT. No; this is my speech upon the report.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the report been published?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not make the point of no quorum.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator objects, I shall not do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator.

(3) CLAIMS OF THE GERMAN GOVERNMENT

Although the House bill provided that no award on account of ships would be paid to the German Government or to any member of the former ruling family, and that no property held by the Alien Property Custodian should be returned to the German Government or the members of the former ruling family, the committee felt that the burden should be upon the shipowners to establish the interest of the German Government or the members of the former ruling family in the ships. An amendment to this effect was adopted. Amendments were also adopted prescribing a definition for the phrase "members of the former ruling family." This definition will be applicable in the case of claims against the United States and also in the return of property held by the Alien Property Custodian.

(4) SHIP CLAIMS OF DANISH CITIZENS

Two of the ships which were seized by the United States belonged to a German association or corporation which, under the plebiscite held under the treaty of Versailles, became a Danish association or corporation. In view of this fact, it seemed to the committee that different treatment should be accorded them, and their claims are handled in a separate section—section 19 of the bill. It seemed to the committee, however, that special treatment was justified only upon the ground that all the interests in the association or corporation were non-German. Accordingly it was provided that those members or stockholders who were German nationals—and it will be noted that this does not mean that all the members or stockholders were German nationals—must have become citizens or subjects of a country other than Germany and that they did not thereafter, and prior to the date on which the bill becomes law, revert to their German citizenship.

(5) INTEREST ON SHIP AWARDS

A committee amendment changes the interest date on the awards of the arbiter (on account of ships, patents, and the radio station) so that his awards will include interest down to January 1, 1929, instead of January 1, 1928, as in the House bill. The effect of this provision is to include the additional year's interest in the $100,000,000 limitation upon the aggregate awards of the arbiter under the bill. It is not believed that any awards will be entered before January 1, 1929.

(6) EXCESSIVE ATTORNEYS' FEES

The provisions designated to prevent the exaction of excessive attorneys' fees are strengthened by committee amendments to prohibit the acceptance of any fee until the amount has been fixed by the appropriate official, and to provide specifically for disbarment from practice before any executive department or agency.

(7) ALIEN PROPERTY TO BE AVAILABLE IMMEDIATELY

In order to provide immediate funds, a committee amendment permits the Secretary of the Treasury to call upon the Alien Property Custodian for an amount not in excess of $40,000,000, to be used in the payment of American claims in accordance with the provisions of the bill. This amount is the estimated 20 per cent, under the House bill, which would eventually have been transferred to the special deposit account. Under the House bill, however, it would have been necessary to wait until the Alien Property Custodian had decided upon the return of the property and had received the written consent of the owner to the retention of the 20 per cent. The Senate amendment, of course, provides for the necessary adjustments if this amount should prove either too small or too large. This provision will greatly facilitate and expedite the payment of American claims.

(8) RETURN OF ALIEN PROPERTY IN CASE OF DEATH OF OWNER

The provisions of the present law and of the House bill relating to the return of alien property in cases where the owner has died or, in the case of a corporation, where it has been dissolved, are amended by the committee and somewhat simplified. In the case of death of the owner, the amount of property to be returned is governed by the status of the decedent. In the case of the dissolution of a corporation, the stockholders' interests will be established, the interest of each stockholder placed in a trust in his name, and will be subject to return to him.

(9) SAVING CLAUSE FOR PENDING SUITS

There are several suits pending brought by the United States or the Alien Property Custodian. In order to remove any possible construction that the provisions of the bill affect these pending suits, a saving clause has been added to section 29.

(10) FEDERAL TAXATION

The provisions relating to taxation are fully discussed in the committee report, and it is not necessary for me to go into them at this time, beyond saying the committee tried to work out provisions which were fair to the owner as well as to the United States.

I might refer to one amendment which we did not have an opportunity to work out in the committee but which I expect to offer to the bill. For purposes of administrative simplicity, to reduce very considerably the work in the Alien Property Custodian's office, and to prevent unnecessary expense I expect to offer an amendment under which all trusts of less than $2,000 held by the Alien Property Custodian will be returned in full—that is, they will not be subject to the retention of 20 per cent.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS NOT ADOPTED BY FINANCE COMMITTEE

The more important amendments suggested during the hearings of the committee which were not adopted by the committee are discussed in the committee report, and the reasons for the action thereon by the committee are stated. There are, however, several other amendments which were proposed but which were not adopted, and it might be well for me to refer to them briefly.

It was suggested that we should pay for the use of certain ships during the war title to which was not taken over by the United States. This suggestion relates to four German ships which were taken by the Cuban Government and which were turned over by the Cuban Government to the United States for its use. At the end of the war these ships were returned to Cuba. Your committee could see no justification for paying the German owners.

It was suggested that a specific provision be inserted to the effect that no award should be made for any ship if it was part of the naval auxiliary fleet of Germany. This proposal was rejected because the provisions of the bill are adequate. Compensation will be paid only for "merchant" ships under the terms of the bill. Furthermore, as to the possibility of a merchant ship being a part of the German naval auxiliary fleet, I understand that, although some of the privately owned vessels were subject to the issuance of German Government orders placing them in the naval auxiliary, no such order was issued as to any of the ships interned in the United States. In any event, however, if it should develop that any of the merchant vessels were actually a part of the naval auxiliary fleet the provisions of the bill are adequate, for they would no longer be "merchant" ships.

It was proposed that provision should be made for the Tuckerton radio station. The facts relating to this station are extremely complicated and in all probability all the facts are not yet known. The proposal was rejected because the bill does not in any way affect transactions between the Alien Property Custodian and private parties. The reason for including in the bill the radio station at Sayville, L. I., is that that station was sold to the United States, and the United States should pay fair compensation for it. As to sales to private parties, however, the field is entirely too broad and unrestricted to permit of any thought of legislation, certainly not without extensive hearings which would require months to conduct. It would seem that whatever rights German nationals may have on account of their interest in the Tuckerton station is a matter to be settled between the parties.

It has been suggested that the time within which German patent owners could bring suit for a reasonable royalty under section 10 of the trading with the enemy act should be extended. It was under this section that the Federal Trade Commission issued licenses during the war for the use of German patents. Royalties were prescribed and the American licensees paid the royalties into the Treasury. Under this section the owner of the patent was entitled to bring suit within one year after the termination of the war—that is, before July 2, 1922—for the judicial determination of a reasonable royalty. There are, roughly, about 200 suits pending in court under this section, covering periods from the date of the license by the Federal Trade Commission to the date of seizure by the Alien Property Custodian of the patent; from the date of seizure by the Alien Property Custodian to the date of sale by the Alien Property Custodian; and after the date of sale by the Alien Property Custodian. In those cases where suits were not brought, section 10 provided that the royalties should be returned to the licensee and that the licensee should not be liable for further payment. It is quite impossible by legislation at this time to deal with all of the innumerable cases and the complex situations.

It was also suggested that the bill should provide for payment for use by the United States during the war period of royalties to which an American national was entitled under a contract with the German owner of the patent. It is believed that whatever rights the American nationals have should be handled in a separate bill to authorize him to sue in the Court of Claims in the same manner as though he were the owner of the patent. Furthermore, there are several other similar situations, and all of these should be dealt with at the same time. No one appeared at the hearings and, consequently, the committee did not have an opportunity to ascertain all the facts involved in the cases.

A proposal was made that the jurisdiction of the Mixed Claims Commission and the liability of Germany should be extended, and that the commission should be given power to enter awards, for example, for debts incurred after the termination of the war. It would seem hardly necessary to answer this proposal, for the liability of Germany is fixed by treaty and the jurisdiction of the Mixed Claims Commission is fixed by agreement. The United States acting alone has no power to change either the treaty or the agreement.

CONCLUSION

I know of no reason why the consideration of this bill by the Senate should require an undue amount of time. I hope that its early enactment will be forthcoming. As I stated above, except upon a very few provisions, there is practically unanimous agreement upon the bill by the members of the Finance Committee. All the private parties affected by the bill are agreed upon it. I hope that the Senate will proceed promptly with its consideration.

PROPOSED ENLARGEMENT OF THE NAVY

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we have before us an important measure involving the disposition of the property of Germans, Austrians, and Hungarians in the possession of the Alien Property Custodian and the adjustment of the claims of the United States and its nationals against Germany and its nationals and the Governments of Austria and Hungary and their nationals. The property to be returned aggregates in value several hundred million dollars, and the sum to be paid by the United States in the settlement will amount to tens of millions of dollars. But with a measure so important before us there appears to be but little interest in the Chamber. On the other side of the Chamber only four Senators appear. On the minority side the showing is slightly improved. Owing to the apparent unconcern in the bill I shall address myself to another matter no less important but which will doubtless excite no greater interest than the subject before us.

Mr. President, during the past few days I have received, and doubtless other Senators have received, telegrams and letters from various parts of the United States urging support of what is denominated "the President's naval program," whatever that may be. The American people have been flagellated by militarists and navalists, and some have been whipped into a frenzy, until they seem to believe that the United States is on the eve of a mighty conflict that threatens its very existence. In my opinion, the premises of the militarists and navalists are wrong. Many of them occupy similar positions to those held by the German militarists prior to the World War, and many of the arguments employed by the leaders of the former German Empire to support their military policies and demands for "preparedness" are urged in our own country to compel Congress to expend hundreds of millions annually in preparations for war.

In making this statement I am not opposing reasonable appropriations for the maintenance of our Army and Navy. I have upon various occasions advocated a naval plan that would give to the United States an adequate, modern, and up-to-date Navy.

I have opposed archaic plans of the Naval Board and condemned some of their reactionary policies. When the naval authorities insisted upon expending one and a half billion dollars to carry out the 1916 naval program I opposed it. The Naval Board fought for this plan and its execution in the face of the experiences and lessons of the war. To them the battleship was not only the foundation but the structure of the Navy. The submarine and airplane and the naval craft and naval weapons which the Great War demonstrated were essential to a modern navy, was accorded but insignificant place in the categories prepared by them of needed naval vessels.

As a member of the Senate Naval Committee I opposed the 1916 program, and insisted that any naval program that did not provide light cruisers, submarines, and airplanes was incomplete and inadequate. At the same time I urged that the United States should join with other nations in reducing armaments and setting up instrumentalities for the settlement of international disputes. It is my view that the United States has fallen short in its efforts to promote world peace and to bring about world disarmament. In the present situation our country, of course, must maintain an adequate Navy—one that is modern and properly balanced with reference to the types and categories of naval craft. For such a Navy I shall give my hearty support. To a military policy—a policy that ignores the high responsibilities resting upon this Nation of leading the world into the path of peace, of developing an international spirit of comity and, indeed, affection—I shall not give my support.

As I view the situation, the thoughts of mankind should be diverted from the channels of war and directed into the paths of peace. This Nation, because of its favored position geographically and otherwise, should lead the world in every movement to promote peace and prevent war. There are many persons, not only in the United States but throughout the world, who will be disappointed at the message which is being written by our country and at the character of greetings which it is sending forth to the peoples of the world.

During the past year there has been a remarkable repercussion of the militaristic spirit throughout the United States, largely as the result of propaganda, and in part due to the agitation of a small minority who seem to have learned nothing from the past, and are unconcerned at the thought of another war with all of its devastation, destruction, and sorrow. And yet the great masses of the people of the world do not want war but peace. They desire to live their lives in peace and to devote their energies to promote justice and freedom—political, economic, and religious. They regard war as race suicide, as the greatest tragedy that may afflict humanity.

The apostles of militarism and of so-called "preparedness" are clamorous, and with fanatical zeal carry forward their crusade in our own country. A vigorous campaign has been waged and is being carried on in favor of stupendous appropriations by Congress for military purposes. Efforts are made to excite the fears of the people that the United States is menaced by powerful foes, and that unless hundreds of millions are immediately expended for so-called military and naval defense, our country will be plunged into a titanic conflict.

Unfortunately there are those in every country who regard world peace as impossible, and who attempt to discredit all efforts looking to the development of an international spirit of amity and the removal of the causes of war. It is the view of many of this class that humanity is forever condemned to bear the chains of military bondage and to pour out its richest blood upon sanguinary battle fields. This is the mechanistic view of the world, and denies, in effect, the existence of an overruling Providence and the capacity of the children of men under the guidance of a divine power to attain the goal of world peace and unity under political and other organizations in which law and justice reign. A pessimistic view, and one not entirely accurate, in my view, is expressed by Mr. H. G. Wells in his "Foreword" to the recent book entitled "Peace or War," by Commander Kenworthy:

> A huge majority of the people of the world think no more of the prevention of war than a warren of rabbits think about the suppression of shotguns and ferrets.

And the militaristic clique, appreciating that the great mass of mankind, absorbed as they are in the burdens of their daily toil, do not give sufficient thought to the formulation of ways and means to promote peace and end war, play upon their credulity, and attempt to lead them to believe that their lives and their countries are in danger, which can only be averted by withdrawing millions of men and women from industry, training them for war, and arming them with deadly weapons and poison gases for the destruction of millions of their fellow men.

Mr. Roosevelt, in a published essay during the World War, stated that the cause of war was fear, and that the chief reason for fear must be removed to prevent the awful tragedies of war.

Lord Grey, in his recent work, tells us that—> fear begets suspicion and distrust and evil imaginings of all sorts till each government feels that it would be criminal, and a betrayal of its own country not to take every precaution while every government regards every precaution of every other government as an evidence of hostile intent.

That there is an active propaganda in the United States, the result of which, if unchecked, must be to inflame the minds of many and lead to preparations upon the part of the United States which will arouse suspicions and provoke similar movements in other countries, must be evident to every person who possesses any knowledge of history and the psychology of peoples. That there is no occasion for a renaissance of militarism in the United States is apparent to those who appreciate the currents that carry humanity forward. This powerful Nation is menaced by no country. Unfortunately, the strident tones and the clamorous voices of a small minority in our country are carried beyond the seas and are calculated to arouse the fears and suspicions of peoples and governments desiring peace and who recognize the primacy of this Republic and would be willing to follow it in every reasonable plan in the interest of international fellowship.

President Coolidge, in his message to Congress a year ago, declared:

> No threatening cloud at the present time darkens the sky.

And in his Trenton speech, December 29, 1926, he declared:

> I do not believe that we can advance the policy of peace by returning to the policy of competitive armaments. * * * While I favor an adequate Army and Navy, I am opposed to any effort to militarize this Nation.

The President further stated in his message to Congress, December 7, 1927, that the proposed expenditure of six hundred and eighty millions for the next fiscal year for the Army and Navy provides the most adequate defensive force our country has ever supported in time of peace and that "as a whole our military policy is sufficient."

In passing, it is not improper to remark that appropriations so enormous for military expenses of the United States for 12 months only, and at a time when it is at peace with the world and there is no menace to its security, would be certain to excite some wonderment, if not ironic laughter, upon the part of persons in other lands. They would have difficulty in perceiving the sincerity of our protestations of peaceful intentions when expending for military purposes more than any nation in the world, and more than double the amount expended by Germany in any one year, even at a time when it is alleged she was preparing for a world conflict.

Judge Hughes, when Secretary of State, said that—

> So far as we can see into the future, the United States is not in the slightest danger from aggression; in no single power and no possible combination of powers lies any menace to our security.

And Secretary Kellogg, in a message published in December, 1926, declared that—

> One of the greatest obstacles to such understanding and sympathy (between nations) is brought about by competitive armaments on land and sea. History has shown that this competition is one of the conditions most pregnant in provoking fear, followed by armed hostility.

In the face of these declarations Congress has recently received the Budget estimates for the Army and the Navy, submitted by the President for the fiscal year 1929, calling for more than $760,000,000 for the normal peace establishment of the United States. This does not include further expenditures which will be made and additional appeals calling for tens of millions of dollars which Congress will be asked to enact into law, nor does it provide for important repairs upon naval craft, and new construction which the Secretary of the Navy, with, presumably, the approval of the President, has asked Congress to authorize.

The Secretary has transmitted to Congress a bill to authorize the construction of 25 light cruisers, 9 destroyer leaders, 25 submarines, and 5 aircraft carriers. If this bill becomes law at this Congress it will constitute the Navy's 1928 building program. It does not include items for repairs and elevation of guns upon battleships and cruisers, and other important activities which will call for large appropriations. The Secretary informs Congress that the estimated cost of this proposed building program is merely "speculative," and but a rough "approximation" of the cost of each unit is submitted, from which it appears that the cruisers will cost $425,000,000, the destroyer leaders $45,000,000, the submarines $160,000,000, and the aircraft carriers $95,000,000. This "speculative approximation" of the Secretary is to proceed upon a base estimate of expenditures amounting to $725,000,000.

This huge sum, as I have indicated, constitutes no part of the ordinary military expenses to which I have referred, amounting to more than $760,000,000 for the fiscal year 1929.

When it is recalled that the appropriations for naval craft have always exceeded the estimated costs it is certain that this proposal involves an expenditure of more than $1,000,000,000 for new naval construction.

When under the terms of the Washington conference treaties a limitation was placed upon capital-ship construction, there was great satisfaction and, may I add, great misunderstanding of its results. It was believed by many persons that naval costs would be materially reduced. But it is apparent from this new naval program submitted by the Secretary of the Navy that the gain in one direction is lost in other ways.

The modification of the 1910 program saved in battleships, but we are now too engulfed in an ocean of naval costs, arising from the building of other types of battleships.

An examination of the cost of completed war vessels authorized under the act of 1916 shows that the final cost was more than double the estimates submitted by the Navy. It is obvious that the execution of this program will demand further appropriations, so that the billion dollars required for the construction of these naval vessels will not be the only amount which will be required to be appropriated. Additional naval officers and seamen must be added to the already large personnel of the Navy.

An admiral recently stated that this naval program would require twenty-odd thousand additional seamen and nearly 2,000 additional naval officers. This will mean that a large sum be added to the figures which I have suggested to meet the annual ordinary expenses of the Navy.

Additional supplies and equipment costing tens of millions of dollars annually will be called for. It is safe to say that to meet this new construction, additional appropriations will be annually required aggregating more than $50,000,000. The chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, in a recent speech, stated that at least $60,000,000 annually must be appropriated for an indefinite period to meet the deterioration chargeable to obsolescence. That amount is in addition to the figures I have just submitted.

The life of naval craft is limited from 15 to 20 years. The present fleet, with its stupendous cost of between a billion and a half and $2,000,000,000, will be obsolete within 20 years, which means, if the present militaristic spirit in the United States continues and the program of new construction recommended by the Secretary of the Navy is carried out, that the expenditure of at least $11,000,000,000 by the Navy Department alone will be made within that period.

The Budget transmitted by the President to Congress on the 5th of December provides the estimates of appropriations for the next fiscal year. These estimates undoubtedly have the approval of the President. The amount provided for the Navy is $362,167,020, and for the War Department $398,823,143. Senators recall that only a day or two ago we passed an appropriation bill for new Army camps and buildings aggregating several million dollars; so that the amount recommended as the ordinary expenses will not cover many other appropriations, which will be made before we adjourn, for the maintenance of the Army. This means that more than $760,000,000 is the estimate approved by the President for the ordinary expenses of the Army and Navy for the next fiscal year. It is certain that in these departments there will be deficiencies to be covered by further appropriations of at least $50,000,000. The ordinary expenses, therefore, of our Military Establishment for the coming fiscal year will be more than $800,000,000.

As above indicated, appropriations of many millions more will be made to meet new construction and the program submitted by the Secretary of the Navy. While we are at peace with the world, and should be making efforts to secure international limitation of armament, a budget providing a sum so enormous for the Military Establishment of our country can not be defended.

It is pertinent to pause for a moment to compare this appropriation with expenditures by the Government in other years.

In 1880 the total expenditures of the Federal Government were $338,865,031. Of that amount, the Army and the Navy, combined received $40,000,000. In 1890 the total expenditures of the Federal Government were $395,430,284. In 1900, $698,912,982. The Army received of this amount $80,430,000 and the Navy $48,099,969. In 1910 the total expenditures of the Federal Government were $1,044,622,000. Of this amount, $95,883,000 went for the maintenance of the Army and $136,935,199 covered the expenditures of the Navy. In 1916 the total expenses of the Government were $1,114,794,000, of which amount the Army received $101,959,195 and the Navy $149,661,864. During the World War, when the military forces of the United States numbered more than four and a half million men, the appropriations for the Army and Navy were very large. During the years from 1922 to 1928, inclusive, Congress has appropriated to meet the expenses of the Navy more than $2,261,000,000 and for the maintenance of the Army more than $2,440,000,000, or a total for military purposes of more than $4,701,000,000.

That does not include the billions expended in pensions and by the Veterans' Bureau in meeting the various demands made upon it pursuant to legislation enacted since the close of the World War.

The Budget estimates for the next fiscal year reveal no reduction in the appropriations for either the Army or Navy, but, on the contrary, a larger amount than for the preceding year. It is certain that our military budget within the next two years, if the present policy prevails, will exceed $1,000,000,000 for ordinary expenses. The officials of the Budget Bureau have, I believe, attempted to stem the great tide of departmental demands for Federal appropriations, and have sought to enforce greater economies in all branches of the Government. They deserve credit for what they have done, but they have been unable to bring the Federal Budget within reasonable and proper limitations. When we consider that in 1916 the total expenditures of the Federal Government were slightly in excess of a billion dollars, it is difficult to understand why the appropriations recommended by the President and the Budget Bureau for 1929 aggregate more than $4,258,000,000. It is certain, however, that with the increasing demands made upon the Federal Government and the growth of bureaucracy and paternalism, the aggregate expenditures authorized by Congress for the next fiscal year will be approximately $5,000,000,000.

Mr. President, there are evidences that confirm the view that this Congress will pass no tax reduction bill. Appropriations are too lavish, and if continued will leave an empty Treasury.

Let me add parenthetically that no greater service could be performed in behalf of the people of the United States by any individual or group of individuals than to awaken the people to the increasing demands for appropriations by the Federal Government and by States and by their political subdivisions. These demands often take the form of paternalistic and socialistic measures, and if unchecked will materially modify the structure of our Government and impose intolerable burdens of taxation upon the people.

The exactions of the Federal and State Governments for the next fiscal year will exceed, in my opinion, $11,000,000,000, the greater part of which will be consumed in paying the salaries of the ever-increasing army of office holders in State and Nation.

We expended between 1884 and 1920 more than $6,000,000,000 for our Navy. In all the wars of the world, from 1793 to 1860, the cost amounted to but $9,243,000,000, and all the wars of the world, from 1861 to 1910, cost but $14,000,000,000. Yet we have expended during the last seven years—years of peace—more than $4,670,000,000 to maintain our Army and Navy. When Germany was at the zenith of her military power her entire appropriation for both army and navy did not exceed $300,000,000 in any year. My recollection is that when Admiral Von Tirpitz was building the German Navy there was not expended for its maintenance and for construction to exceed $111,000,000 in any single year.

In my opinion we can not justify our naval program or the enormous appropriations for military purposes. The appropriations for the present fiscal year provide for keeping in commission 500 vessels, 178 of which are assigned to shore activities, and also for the care of 344 vessels which are not manned and commissioned for active service. Many of these vessels in the last-named category, particularly destroyers, are seaworthy and could quickly be put into shape for active service. Our capital ships are more modern and are superior to those of Great Britain or any other country. President Coolidge, in his annual message to Congress, December 7, 1926, stated that no navy in the world, with one exception approaches ours, and none surpasses it. Mr. Hector Bywater, one of the ablest naval critics, in an article appearing in the Baltimore Sun a year ago, declared that—

Taking all factors into consideration the American fleet is adjudged to be superior to the British fleet.

He also stated that—

Even in gun power the advantage is held to lie with the American fleet.

Our 18 capital ships, with a tonnage of 528,850, constitute a more effective fighting unit than Great Britain possesses. Seven of our capital ships were completed between 1918 and 1923, and are superior in construction, equipment, and in fighting strength and power to those of the British Navy.

We have in the Naval Establishment at this time 10 modern 7,500-ton cruisers which at their rated tonnage give 75,000 tons of vessels in this class. Each of these cruisers carries 6-inch guns and excels the best British cruisers in the rate of speed. In addition, the Navy has 22 cruisers of the second line, not all of which are in commission, with an aggregate tonnage of 50,000. This brings our present and authorized cruiser tonnage to more than 200,000. Congress has heretofore authorized the construction of eight 10,000-ton cruisers to mount 8-inch guns, which when completed will give us an additional 80,000 tons in modern cruisers. A number of these cruisers are in the course of construction and upon their completion our Navy will have 155,000 tons in modern cruisers.

The American delegates to the recent naval conference held at Geneva indicated that our Government was willing to consider a limitation on cruiser tonnage of 250,000 to 300,000 for the United States and the British Empire and from 150,000 to 180,000 for Japan. The Secretary of the Navy now proposes to add to our Naval Establishment 250,000 tons of cruisers, equal to the entire quota of tonnage submitted to the Geneva conference as the American minimum.

When it was indicated at the Geneva conference that the United States intended under this proposal to ultimately have twenty-five 10,000-ton cruisers in its quota of 250,000 tons, the British found the proposal unacceptable. And yet if the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy be adopted, it means an ultimate cruiser tonnage of the United States of 455,000; and upon the assumption that the new cruisers, if authorized, will be of the 10,000-ton, 8-inch gun type, we will have 35 cruisers of this description in the Naval Establishment, whereas the proposal at Geneva was for not more than 25.

When the Washington treaty was entered into the United States had 13 cruisers and 9 gunboats now listed as cruisers. These vessels were from 3,000 to 16,000 tons and in speed were rated from 21 to 27 knots. Great Britain had 67 cruisers, only 10 being above 5,000 tons. Most of Great Britain's cruisers were old, some of them being constructed between 1900 and 1905. At least 24 have been withdrawn from service because of being obsolete.

Of those remaining in Great Britain's fleet, 34 are less than 5,000 tons, and of these 34, 13 are less than 4,000 tons. Great Britain has 4 cruisers of 9,500 tons carrying 7½-inch guns and 2 cruisers of 7,750 tons carrying 6½-inch guns.

This recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy will be regarded as a declaration to other nations that the United States is entering upon a competitive naval program. It will inevitably produce unfavorable reactions; it will arouse fear in many countries and create suspicion as to the course which the United States intends to take in its relations with other nations. That it will provoke nations now struggling with financial burdens to increase their armament, must be apparent to all. The consequences, so far as they relate to world peace, will be most unfortunate. This naval outburst upon the part of the Secretary of the Navy is greatly to be deplored.

Mr. H. G. Wells, in the "Foreword," to which I have referred, alludes to the gathering rivalry between the United States and Great Britain in naval arms and to the discussion of war between the two countries, and states that it is—largely due to the stupid professionalism of experts in both countries.

May I add, in passing, that in my opinion the failure of the Geneva conference was largely due to the failure of the United States to have proposed for submission to the conference a definite plan or policy for further limitations of naval craft, and to the fact that naval forces and experts dominated or at least exercised too great an influence.

Continuing, Mr. Wells said:

Whether a war between United States and Great Britain is to be regarded as a tolerable possibility does not enter into the philosophy of the naval monomaniacs on either side of the water. Their business is to make Britain "safe" from the United States and the United States "safe" from Britain, and they are quite capable of calculating upon Japan as an ally in such war.

Mr. President, I have before me a copy of the speech recently delivered by Admiral Plunkett. In my opinion, his speech does not deserve much commendation but condemnation. He said:

The penalty of national efficiency, either in commerce or in arms, is war.

If I read history aright, we are nearer war to-day than ever before, because we are pursuing a competitive trade policy and crowding other nations into the background. A policy of this kind inevitably leads to war. But if you don't want war, be a worm and crawl into the nearest hole in the ground. If we had been prepared for war in 1917, we never would have been dragged into it, and now we are paying $26,000,000,000 on account of our stupid unpreparedness.

Mr. President, I have before me a volume which contains statements made by the military cabal, by professors, by generals, by statesmen in Germany prior to the World War, and they parallel the statements made by the militarists of the United States during the past year. There has been a propaganda, nation-wide in extent, carried on by high officials of the Government, by some officers of the Army and Navy, by various clubs and organizations in support of a policy that would require billions of dollars to be spent in military preparations during the next few years. Representations have been made that our country was practically without defense, that its security was menaced, and its life imperiled by warlike nations of the world, all of whom were enemies of the United States. Talk of this character was calculated to arouse the fears of many people and to stimulate them to activity in demanding large appropriations for so-called preparedness. I observe in the same paper carrying the speech of Admiral Plunkett an observation made at the same meeting by Congressman LAGUARDIA. It will be regarded by some as a sufficient answer to the militant speech of the naval officer.

Rome conquered the world and had the most perfect military machine in the universe, but it was confronted with a new philosophy laid down by the Carpenter of Nazareth and it crumpled and was crushed.

This statement the meeting applauded.

The speaker ridiculed the idea that the United States and Great Britain could be forced into war against each other, and he considered there was no danger from any other power.

If we embark on the proposed five-year naval building program there will be no further tax reduction, as you can't pull money out of the air.

Admiral Plunkett, when interrogated, confessed that he was referring to Great Britain as a nation with which the United States would soon be at war. Talk of that kind, Mr. President, I characterize as not only unwise but harmful to the United States and calculated to disturb its relations with other nations and to arouse their fears and resentments.

I have before me a copy of an article recently written by Mr. Frank H. Simonds, who is now in Europe, and whose knowledge of world conditions gives to his utterances a peculiar value.

I ask permission to insert as a part of my remarks excerpts from this article and another article written by him the following week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

EUROPE SEES AMERICA AS SEEKING WORLD RULE—CONTINENT PICTURED AS BELIEVING UNITED STATES DELIBERATELY PLANS CONQUEST—DEBT AND NAVAL POLICIES CITED

By Frank H. Simonds

GENEVA: "Uncle Sam, imperialist."

It was under this title that I found the familiar gentleman, whom we all accept as symbolical of our Nation, masquerading, when I first arrived in Europe more than five months ago. And it is as an imperialist, conscious, deliberate, and determined, that I have been forced to hear him described in many countries and by the representatives of many nations not only constantly but increasingly since that time.

From Moscow to London Europe is at the present time discussing American policy as the revelation of definite and matured purpose to obtain world hegemony. American ambition, interpreted in European comment, aims at no less than threefold mastery: We are "out" to combine financial domination of the universe with naval supremacy on the seven seas and political and even territorial control and expansion in both Americas.

What the United States is now doing, in Europe's mind, constitutes a strikingly close parallel to what Spain, France, and Germany tried to do in Europe, and what the British have been able to do on the seas and in distant continents in the past two centuries.

GOES BACK TO DEBTS

If one might summarize the European conclusion, it would be stated something like this: "America is the richest, the strongest, the most powerful country on this planet. Since the Roman Empire no nation has been comparably irresistible. But no country has possessed even a fraction of the power now in American hands without setting out to rule the world. The question is not whether America will make one more of the experiments in imperialism with which European history is filled, but how it will undertake it."

Europe, the American visitor will be told, first became aware of American imperialism, when, after repudiating the League of Nations and relapsing into traditional isolation, the United States promulgated its debt policy. No European will argue that his own country would have followed a different policy from the American. Even for him such a statement would seem too absurd. What he says is that we did what any European country would have done under the circumstances, and thus our motives must have been similar.

SCANS OWN NAVAL RECORD

Uncle Sam is, then, "out" for financial domination of the world. That assertion is, in a sense, old, since the indictment of "Uncle Sam" as Uncle Shylock has been going forward with a varying degree of intensity for several years. His appearance as the aspirant for sea supremacy is, by contrast, somewhat more recent. Nevertheless, the conception has been developing in Europe ever since the Washington conference of 1921–22.

* * * * * * *

RECENT NAVAL PARLEY

When President Coolidge called the naval conference which assembled in Geneva last summer the proceedings of that meeting, which were interpreted for the Continent by the British press, had the character of a demand for actual supremacy covered by an argument for specious parity. When, after the failure of the conference, we announced our program for naval expansion, its magnitude and proposed expenditure fairly took European breath away. Moreover, it was instantly accepted as the final demonstration that we were seeking naval supremacy, that he had been deliberately seeking it from the Washington conference onward, and that we were now going to realize our ambition.

The third major circumstance of what Europe regards as our imperialism is our alleged purpose to dominate the American continents.

To understand this phase of European thought it is essential to know that at all times the Kellogg-Briand conversations over the famous project to outlaw war were invariably bracketed in European press comment with our military operations in Nicaragua. Thus the American gesture, the proposal to expand the Briand formula into a general renunciation of war, was interpreted as a moral cloak for our military actions.

But far more important in European eyes were the reservations we sought to append to the specific arbitration pact with France, and particularly those reservations which concerned the Monroe doctrine. These, to the European mind, disclosed the deliberate purpose to reserve for ourselves without any possible limitation, beyond any conceivable interference, the whole South American and Central American region as the field for our territorial and economic imperialism.

EUROPE IS AWAKENING TO LEADERSHIP OF UNITED STATES—NATIONS ABROAD AIDED IN CONCLUSION BY HABANA CONFERENCE AND AMERICAN STAND OF INDIVIDUALITY

By Frank H. Simonds

GENEVA.—Not since the height of the resentment roused by the debt question, more than two years ago, has there been any such explosion of criticism of the United States as has accompanied the Pan American Conference at Habana. Why this meeting should have had any large importance for Europe it is difficult to see; nevertheless the European press seized upon it with something like general unanimity and used it as the opportunity to denounce the United States.

Actually the Habana affair came as a climax to the series of American incidents which have attracted general European attention. Within a single month we had proclaimed a naval program which, for Europe, was the promise of American supremacy; in our discussions with France over a treaty to outlaw war we had conducted an operation judged by Europe to be attack upon the League of Nations, which to the European mind was as dangerous as it was direct; finally, at Habana, we were—so Europe assumed—undertaking to demonstrate our hegemony in the three Americas.

HIT "NEW" MONROE DOCTRINE

As a result, all European journals turned suddenly to the discussion of the American phenomenon. What were we after and what, beyond all else, was this Monroe doctrine of which we had so much to say? It had been, Paris newspapers solemnly explained, a proclamation designed to forbid European powers from conducting colonial enterprises in America, to prohibit the holy alliance from assisting in the reconquest of Spanish colonies. It was, then, a century ago a doctrine of America for the Americans.

But it was that no longer. On the contrary, as the United States now proclaimed it, the Monroe doctrine was a policy which operated to enable the United States, without European interference, to exploit and direct all three Americas. It was the wall by which we were seeking to shut Europe and the world out of South America. Our policy was not the old Monroe doctrine, "America for the Americans," but the new "All the Americas for the Yankees."

And what were we doing down there? Every important newspaper in Europe, in London as in Paris and in Rome, managed to set the news of the fighting coming from Nicaragua alongside the expressions of American idealism uttered by the President of the United States and echoed by the American press and public opinion.

HYPOCRISY CHARGED

Nicaragua, for Europe, was the sign that we intended to do in Central America what Great Britain, France, Germany, all the colonial powers, had done in Asia and in Africa. Our interferences in various directions, at Panama, in Haiti, in Nicaragua, were carefully collected into a statistical disclosure of American intentions. Our marines were going in to protect our dollars.

Inevitably, all American protestations of high purpose were regarded on this side of the Atlantic as hypocritical.

"We all have little Nicaraguas of our own," sneered the Morning Post in London.

"American imperialism is renewing in Latin America the achievements of French imperialism in Morocco and British in India," declared the Communistic Humanite of Paris.

"The United States has two standards for the great principles of its democratic peace policy," observed the semiofficial Temps, in an article which the London Times significantly reprinted, "according as it applies them universally or on the American Continent, where they are subservient to the hegemony it has already acquired there."

Equally definite were the charges that we were seeking to establish an American league of nations which should be a rival to the Geneva institution, but in which other member nations would be subservient to us. We were seeking in part to force, in part to persuade, the Latin American States, members of the Geneva body, to leave it. Like our attack upon the league in our Briand-Kellogg negotiations of a peace pact, the Habana episode was aimed at the League of Nations.

FEELS AMERICAN POWER

In the post-war years Europe has again and again been brought face to face with the negative consequences of our actions, our refusals to join the league, to accept European responsibilities. It has felt increasingly the power of our wealth. But what it has not even dreamed of is that along with the elements of power went the purpose to use them. Suddenly our naval program, the Briand-Kellogg discussions, the Habana conference, combined to reproduce something like a revolution in European conception.

* * * * * * *

Mr. KING. I shall trespass on the time of the Senate to read a paragraph from the last article apropos of the Habana conference of which we have heard so much and from which it is sincerely hoped great good will result.

Within a single month we had proclaimed a naval program which, for Europe, was the promise of American supremacy; in our discussions with France over a treaty to outlaw war we had conducted an operation judged by Europe to be an attack upon the League of Nations, dangerous as it was direct; finally, at Habana, we were—so Europe assumed—undertaking to demonstrate our hegemony in the three Americas.

Speaking of Europe, he said:

It has felt increasingly the power of our wealth. But what it has not even dreamed of is that along with the elements of power went the purpose to use them. Suddenly our naval program, the Briand-Kellogg discussions, the Habana conference, combined to reproduce something like a revolution in European conception.

Mr. President, if time permitted, I could present to the Senate the utterances of journalists and statesmen and persons of importance and repute in many countries of the world, in which they discuss the attitude of this Republic toward other nations and give their interpretations of our policies and purposes. There is a remarkable concurrence of view among these divergent groups. Generalizing, it may be said that the motives of the United States are questioned and fear is entertained as to the international course which this Republic will pursue.

A wise and just course will eradicate these apprehensions. We hold the keys that will unlock the hearts of the world. The United States can enter the sacred precincts of humanity's affection. We must not throw away this great opportunity for service and leadership.

But I return to the thread of my remarks: In submarines we are superior to any other nation. At the present time in commission there are 3 fleet submarines, 43 submarines of the first line, and 29 of the second line, which means that we have 78 active submarines in the Naval Establishment. Three additional fleet submarines are in the course of construction, and there are 43 additional submarines out of commission but substantially as good as those in commission. But the Secretary of the Navy now asks for 32 additional submarines, to be constructed at a cost which he roughly estimates at $160,000,000 but which will probably be $200,000,000.

On November 16 of last year the new aircraft carrier Saratoga went into commission, and on December 14, the very day the Secretary gave his request for additional naval construction, the Lexington, the other modern aircraft carrier, went into commission. The ultimate cost of these two vessels has not been definitely determined, but an estimate made December 19 places the expenditures of the Lexington at $39,958,881.61. This means that the two carriers will cost approximately $80,000,000. It is quite likely that when they receive their complement aircraft and necessary auxiliaries, $100,000,000 will be the cost to the Government.

Yet, in the face of these enormous figures and with the success of these airplane carriers largely a question of experimentation, the Secretary comes to Congress with the request for the construction of five more airplane carriers at a cost of $19,000,000 each. Of course, the cost of these new carriers will not be $95,000,000 but a sum greatly in excess of $100,000,000, even though their cost would be less than 50 per cent of the cost of the Lexington and Saratoga.

Neither the security nor the prestige of the United States requires this latest display of naval extravagance. If progress is made in the limitation of armaments, it is necessary to limit cruiser tonnage to an aggregate which is entirely incompatible with the extravagant program submitted by the Secretary of the Navy.

It is frequently asserted that the Washington conference established a ratio of 5–5–3 for all naval vessels. This is, of course, incorrect. The conference dealt primarily with the capital ship, which by definition included all vessels of war having a displacement in excess of 10,000 tons and carrying a gun having a caliber in excess of 8 inches. This provision limiting naval armament by exclusion made the 10,000-ton cruiser, mounting 8-inch guns, the largest vessel of war which could be constructed outside of the limitations of the treaty. Vessels of this class were permitted without limitation as to number, which means without limitation as to aggregate tonnage. The British were ready to agree both to the 5–5–3 ratio and upon the aggregate tonnage for cruisers which should be above the 6,000-ton, 6-inch gun class, but otherwise excluded from the capital ship classification of the Washington treaty.

It would seem that the number of 10,000-ton, 8-inch gun cruisers which Great Britain requires as reasonably necessary for her protection and the protection of her dominions would be adequate for the United States. If this view had been adopted at the Geneva conference, the British might have proceeded to build such number of 6,000-ton, 6-inch gun cruisers as they required as their necessary complement, unstimulated by the competitive building of vessels of this class upon our part, for which, our naval authorities say, we have no special need.

These smaller cruisers are in no wise a menace to the United States. They can not operate at such a distance from their bases to get effective contact with our shores. Their construction ought to be curtailed in the interest of economy, but economic pressure for this purpose is much stronger in Great Britain than in the United States. It seems obvious that the proposals of the Secretary of the Navy laying down a program for additional naval construction are calculated, if not intended, to interfere with, and quite likely to interdict any progress toward an international agreement for the further limitation of naval armament.

Destroyers are important vessels in naval warfare. The United States has 276 vessels of this class, Great Britain but 169, and Japan 78. In addition our Naval Establishment possesses 17 destroyer leaders having a larger tonnage and speed than those of similar type in the naval establishments of other countries. A survey of our Naval Establishment supports the view indicated by the President that there is no superior navy in the world and perhaps but one which equals in fighting strength that of the United States.

Mr. President, there is nothing in the attitude of any country to justify this military hysteria which possesses some Americans. Whom have we to fear on this hemisphere? Between the United States and Canada there is the utmost good will. The future will witness a growing regard and indeed affection between the peoples of the United States and Canada.

The republics to the south of us desire the good will and friendship of this Republic. There is no militarism on their part, and their expenditures for military purposes are scarcely sufficient for police protection.

May I digress, Mr. President, to remark that in the last Democratic platform, adopted in 1924, there was incorporated a plank, broad and comprehensive, dealing with our relations with the Latin-American Republics. I had the honor to write that plank. We referred to interests held in common between these countries and the United States, and declared the importance of maintaining the most cordial relations. One of Mr. Bryan's sentences—uttered several years before—was added to the platform declaration. The sentence was:

> God has made us neighbors—justice shall keep us friends.

Our duty to the Latin-American States is to see that justice is done. God has made us neighbors; justice should bind us together, and strengthen the ties of friendship as the years and centuries pass.

There are some Americans who point to Japan as an enemy of the United States, and a naval power against which we must arm. I deplore these attacks upon a friendly nation. Japan's attitude toward the United States has been one of friendship and consideration. With her large population and limited resources, and her peculiar geographical position, it is not improper for Japan to adopt reasonable means for her security against possible difficulties with Russia and China. The economic disadvantages to which Japan is subject preclude her from becoming a great military power, even though she were disposed to assume that rôle. The Japanese desire peace and the good will of all nations. A year ago, when a naval program covering a period of four years was proposed, it was rejected, although it called for an appropriation of but $147,000,000. A subsequent proposition was submitted by the Marine Minister calling for an expenditure of $130,000,000, extending over a period of five years; 2 per cent to be expended the first year and less than 5 per cent the second year. If conditions were less chaotic in China and Russian policies less uncertain, Japan's military establishment would be reduced below its present limits.

At the recent Geneva conference Japan exhibited a desire for a further limitation of armaments, and her honorable and pacific course won for her the highest praise. So in the various conferences which have been held since the World War for the purpose of promoting peace and limiting and reducing armaments, Japan has taken a leading part. Her course has been for peace and not war, and her example has been worthy of emulation by other countries.

Mr. President, whom do we fear in Europe? Those who attempt to provoke controversies between the United States and Great Britain are enemies not only of their own country but of the world. It is inconceivable that there should be war between this Republic and the English-speaking people who live under the British flag.

The inhabitants of Germany entertain for the United States the most cordial feelings.

I recall, Mr. President, when the last tariff bill was under consideration there were many critical statements of Germany in this body. It was alleged that she was still militant and revengeful, and only waiting the hour when she could arise from the ashes of defeat and confound those with whom she had warred.

I did not entertain that view, and contended for a tariff policy that would encourage trade and commerce between the United States and Germany and strengthen the bonds of fellowship between these great democracies. Two and a half years ago I was in Germany and met President von Hindenburg and leaders of German thought. The views entertained by some when Von Hindenburg was elected that he would attempt to turn Germany into monarchial paths were not warranted. I found the President to be a man of peace. He was loyally supporting the Ebert constitution and trying to direct the course of the German Republic along the paths of honor and progress. We have nothing to fear from Germany. Germany seeks the friendship and the good will of the American people.

We should seek every opportunity to extend the hand of fellowship to the German people. There are millions of American citizens of German ancestry. They have contributed to the material and spiritual development of the United States. There can be no further misunderstandings between these two great Nations.

The German people are devoting themselves to the rehabilitation of their country. They have given every evidence of their peaceful intentions and their desire to win the regard of all nations. There is no will to war in Germany, but on the contrary the ways of peace are being followed.

Neither France nor Italy is a menace to the United States. The people of those countries are the friends of this Republic. We need have no fear of Russia or of bolshevism. Slowly and painfully the Russian people are emerging from the dark night of bolshevism. The great mass of Russian people desire the friendship of the United States. They wish contacts with the world. They want and they need the help of the United States and other countries in order that Russia may be put upon the highway of progress and prosperity. In my opinion it is to be regretted that the proposition for disarmament made by Litvinoff, speaking for the Soviet Government, has been treated with so little consideration. Concede it to have been a gesture; in my opinion it represented the view of the overwhelming majority of the Russian people. They suffered during the World War and their lives since then have been a constant tragedy. They desire peace and relief from the unhappy conditions under which they live.

Mr. President, is it not time for the people of the United States to take the lead in bringing peace on earth and good will among men? Our financial power in the world is recognized. America should wear the crown of moral leadership. The great World War should have taught us, as well as other nations, the folly of war and the futility of great military operations. Nations that prepare for war usually have war.

In a little over four years of war more than 7,146,000 of the flower of the allied nations gave their lives on battle fields; more than 12,000,000 were wounded, and more than 4,600,000 were missing. Germany and her allies lost more than 4,650,000 killed, and those who were wounded numbered more than 8,500,000. It is impossible to compute the direct losses measured in money; and the indirect losses can not be comprehended.

The expenses of the war and the property loss have been estimated at between three and four hundred billion dollars; and still war is a "legal institution" and the world is oppressed with demands to maintain armies and military establishments and construct mighty navies, realizing, as we must, that they will not prevent war, but, indeed, will be quite likely to provoke war. During the past seven years the United States has pursued a cynical attitude towards all efforts to promote world peace. We refused to join the League of Nations or become a member of the World Court or participate in the conferences of the league, where efforts have been made and are being made to devise some practical plan of limiting military armament and removing the causes of war.

I repeat, the material strength and financial resources of the United States demand that it assume the responsibility of world leadership to outlaw war and bring international good will. Our disclaimers of any desire for conquest will not be sufficient. The need of world leadership was never so great.

I recall a statement recently made by a great British statesman, Ramsay MacDonald. He said, "What the world needs to-day more than anything else is a political Shakespeare," meaning by that, as I interpreted his speech, that we needed some one who could understand human nature and the causes that move humanity, a man who had vision, a prophet—not the narrow-minded nationalist who wraps bunting about him and declares that he is a 100 per cent Britisher or a 100 per cent American.

Labor in all parts of the world is more united in demanding world peace than ever before. There is a feeling that men may no longer be led to the shambles or caused to die upon the battle field at the whim and caprice of an autocrat or to satisfy the ambition of the wicked and imperialistic desires of a military cabal or an oligarchy of wealth.

The benignant spirit of municipal law and its happy consequences can be imported into international relations, and there can be developed a spirit of international fellowship and good will and an international code of laws which will remove the causes of war and produce a higher standard of civilization.

If we persist in our propaganda for a big Navy, and deprecate all efforts to establish tribunals for the settlement of international disputes, there will be developed a spirit and habits which will constitute impediments to world peace. The fate of this Nation as well as other nations rests upon the character of the people; and character results from many processes. Spencer declared that institutions are dependent upon character, and, however changed in their superficial aspects, can not be changed in their essential nature faster than character changes. If statesmen, publicists, writers, and teachers talk of war and preparation for war, and great armies and mighty navies, and declare that our country is in danger at the hands of other nations, the minds of the people will respond, and the institutions of the country, domestic and national, made to conform to those mental pictures.

Thomas Paine taught that—

> An army of principles will penetrate where an army of soldiers can not; it will succeed where diplomatic management would fail; it is neither the Rhine, the Channel, nor the ocean that can arrest its progress; it will march on the horizon of the world and will conquer.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, February 16, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of yesterday, to-day, and forever, we know that Thy mercy underlies the spacious earth around. The divine life in humanity is the supreme test that we may rise above our present limitations. As the problems of government are with us, help us to solve them with patience, gentleness, and brotherly love. Let our moderation be known among all men, desisting from self-praise, self-glorification, and invidious comparisons. Spare us from becoming a torment of our own ambitions and a prey of our own untamable desires. Guide us, for we are needy; help us, for we are weak; deliver us, for the way is uncertain; and save us lest we fall. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADDRESS OF HON. EDWARD E. ESLICK, OF TENNESSEE

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a very interesting address by my colleague, Mr. ESLICK, delievered over the radio February 15. It is an able address and should be read with pleasure and profit by everyone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

THE AGRICULTURAL SITUATION

I am to talk for a few minutes on the agricultural situation. January, 1921, saw fewer mortgages on farm lands in the United States than at any time within half a century. All products during and following the war brought high prices. Really, all kinds of business in the United States was financially in good condition when the collapse came in 1920.

There is an old adage, "Money talks." If this be true, the farmers of the country and money have not been on speaking terms since 1920. Whose fault is this? Recently a large landowner and wheat grower from Kansas, testifying before the Interstate Commerce Commission, said: "We have some good farmers, but we have a lot of poor ones. Most of these unsuccessful ones buy automobiles on the installment plan before they get their crops harvested. Any lack of success they have is due to laziness, shiftlessness, and improvidence. On my own farm I do everything with machinery and tractors. I have not a single horse or mule on the place."

The average farmer of the country is not able to have the latest improved machinery. Nor can the average farmer of the country produce his crop without horse stock. No more can a dairy be operated without cows than a cotton farmer cultivate his crop without mules. This utterance is a slander on the farmers of America!

The answer to this statement is, that only 4 per cent of the farmers of the world live in America. Yet this 4 per cent of the world's farmers produce 7 per cent of the world's corn, 60 per cent of its cotton, 50 per cent of its tobacco, 25 per cent of its oats, 20 per cent of its wheat, 15 per cent of its barley, and 11 per cent of the world's potatoes. Of the seven articles most needed and used by man the 4 per cent of American farmers produce nearly 36 per cent of the world's output. Branded as lazy and shiftless, the American farmer on an average produces nine times as much as the average world farmer.

The American farmer is not shiftless and lazy. He produces too much. The issue now is to keep from producing a surplus and, if produced, to prevent it from controlling the price of the balance of his crops. We will always have the question of surplus and how to dispose of it at fair prices. There are 970,000,000 acres of land in the United States subject to cultivation, yet in 1926 only 328,000,000 acres of these lands were under cultivation. At the present rate of productivity, if all of our land subject to cultivation was producing, this country alone could almost feed and clothe the teeming millions of the world.

The financial journals tell us that 1926 and 1927 were the most prosperous peace-time years our country has known. That our earning capacity has been greater and wealth has accumulated faster than at any other peace time in our history. Nearly one-third of our population is agricultural. The gross income of our country last year was nearly $95,000,000,0000. Yet the agricultural population—one-third in numbers—received only 10 per cent of this income. From Crops and Markets, July, 1927, a Government publication, it is stated that between January 1, 1921, and January 1, 1927, agricultural invested capital declined $15,000,000,000, while the corporate wealth of America increased $35,000,000,000. Agricultural invested wealth in 1926 and 1927 earned only 3½ per cent each year. Invested corporate wealth earned 13 per cent yearly. The earnings of the farmer were on the reduced investment. The earnings of corporate wealth were on increased values.

That I may give you the real picture of the farmer's condition, I want to borrow from the speech of the Hon. JAMES W. COLLIER, of Mississippi, one of the ablest and most conservative of southern Representatives. In the House he recently said the flood "interrupted over 3,000 miles of railroad transportation, flooded over 12,000,000 acres of land in 174 counties in 7 States." As to the ability of this great farming section to bear its part of rehabilitation, he said: "There is $770,000,000 invested in mortgages on land and in bonds, and $45,000,000 is still outstanding of levee bonds. Now its assessed valuation so bonded and so mortgaged aggregates $815,000,000." The picture is black. The land in 174 counties in 7 States mortgaged and encumbered to its full assessed value. The world has no finer lands than the great Mississippi Valley—rich as the Valley of the Nile.

I do not believe that the farmer has been intentionally destroyed by other lines of business and industry, because he is the producer of the two things that all peoples must have—food and clothing. On the other hand, he is the greatest consumer of the products of other lines of industry and trade of any single class in the country. The farm body is large—more than 7,000,000 farmers engaged in the different kinds of agriculture. It is impossible to organize all of them in cooperation so as to control production and marketing. Industry, generally speaking, is constituted of much smaller bodies. They can and do organize for self-protection. Groups of industry have interlinking interests. They help each other for mutual safety and protection. Always the purpose is to make more money. In the end the combination puts the strangle hold upon the unorganized farmer, who is unable to protect himself.

That the farmer has asked aid through legislation is of recent origin. Seven years ago the corn farmers of the West began the agitation for Federal farm relief. From bad crops and low prices this demand extended to the wheat producers of the West; then to the livestock people; and finally when the cotton farmer was upon his knees and his crop was bringing 60 per cent of the cost of production, he, too, joined hands with his unfortunate brethren and turned his face toward Washington and asked that the cotton interests should be cared for.

We are told that farm relief legislation is impossible. We are further told that the farmer can not be benefited by legislation. Nearly all lines of industry have been taken care of by legislation. The manufacturer has his subsidy in the form of a tariff. Labor has increased its wages through the naturalization laws. The corporate wealth of the land engaged in interstate commerce is permitted to charge a rate sufficient to make reasonable earning on its invested capital; when this is denied by the Interstate Commerce Commission they go to the Federal courts, and almost invariably relief is granted. The effect is, business engaged in interstate commerce is guaranteed a fair return on the investment. The same rule applies to intrastate business through the public utilities commissions. Banks throughout the land, both State and Federal, are permitted to charge a rate sufficient to make a fair return on their capital. And so on throughout the entire lines of business, enterprise, and trade. But the farmer has no guaranty. He is advised to labor and to wait. And he is still laboring to get out of the ditch—patiently waiting. When he makes a demand, it is branded as economically unsound and unconstitutional. From the great business interests of the land, entrenched and protected by favored and unfair legislation, every piece of progressive legislation is assailed as unsafe, unsound, and unconstitutional. Monopoly invokes the Constitution as the guillotine to behead and destroy all progressive legislation.

For one, I do not believe that prosperity can be restored to the farmer by a single act of Congress. But there must be a beginning, and it should be in good faith to better the farmer's condition. I was the first from my State, and, in fact, one of the first southern Representatives, to declare for the McNary-Haugen bill in the first session of the Sixty-ninth Congress. I did not think and do not now believe that this bill would give complete relief to agriculture. But it is the best bill offered, with a chance of passage.

It is in the right direction. I am willing to try it and, by experience, perfect it. If I could write the farm relief bill, it would differ from all the bills before the House committee. My thought is to reduce the tariff one-half on the things, and the material which goes into the things, the farmers use. I would materially reduce the transportation charges on his products. Then I would back cooperative marketing with enough of the public funds to establish cooperation between the producer and the consumer, where supply would meet demand at a fair price with a reasonable profit to the producer. The difference in price from producer to consumer is too great. The article which brings $1 to the producer is delivered to the kitchen door of the consumer at $3.

Farm legislation was defeated in the first session of the Sixty-ninth Congress. The McNary-Haugen bill was passed in the last session of that Congress and vetoed by the President. He assigned many reasons for the veto. Unconstitutionality of the equalization fee was stressed. Farm relief is knocking again at the door of Congress. Many views are expressed at the hearings before the Agriculture Committee of the House. The West and South are agreed that farm relief is badly needed. But there is a great diversity of opinion as to the kind of legislation needed. One line of thought is for cooperative marketing financed by and under Government control. Another is the debenture plan, the payment upon exports rather than the tariff as the yardstick. But the real struggle is over the McNary-Haugen bill. Practically all the objections raised to this measure by the President have been taken from the present bill. The debatable issue now is the McNary-Haugen bill, with or without the equalization fee. What the result will be no one knows. I believe that if the McNary-Haugen bill is reported to the House, either with or without the equalization fee, it will pass. If with the equalization fee it will meet a veto at the hands of the President, if he is to remain consistent.

The Farm Bureau Federation and almost all allied and kindred farm organizations are demanding the passage of this bill with the equalization fee. And at the present time my information is that the Agricultural Committee is favorable to the equalization fee.

I can not get what I want in the way of a farm bill. I believe the farmers are entitled to relief. I shall support the best measure offered which has a chance of passage—the McNary-Haugen bill, if reported to the House. Legislation is never what any one Congressman or Senator wants. It is the result of discussion, concession, and compromise. Any farm bill which shall meet the approval of the two Houses—the Senate and the House—must be one of compromise, representing the consensus of opinion chiefly of Representatives and Senators from agricultural sections—the West, Middle West, and South. If the President vetoes the bill, I do not believe it can be passed over his veto.

Whatever else that may be said, the fight is on for relief legislation for agriculture. It is here to stay until it obtains. If this Congress denies the farmer relief, he will be back here at the next Congress, and the battle will continue until his rights are recognized and he is placed upon the same basis as other business and industry. This great class of our citizenship asks no advantage. They demand a fair deal and an equal opportunity. These are the basic rights of every business man. They are now denied to the farmer. No issue is ever settled until it is settled right. The man, the indispensable man, whose labor produces the food and clothing of mankind, is in distress. He is appealing to Congress not for favors but for fairness—that equal and exact justice may be done him. He asks nothing more. He will be satisfied with nothing less.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a personal statement for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, last evening I had the distinguished honor of addressing the Electrical League in this city, and this morning the Washington Post does me the honor or dishonor to print scare headlines as follows:

Congress power critics brutes, EATON asserts.

I wish simply to say that I never used the word, thought of it, or was within a thousand miles of it in connection with power critics or anyone else.

I am opposed to any form of political investigation of the power industry or any other industry in this country, but I am in favor of any necessary investigation that is designed to build up and strengthen the power business, which constitutes the keystone in our industrial structure and that will advance our general industrial and economic prosperity.

I made the speech and expressed myself, as I thought, clearly. I have had some experience in the use of words and I decline to be held responsible for any moronic misinterpretation made by others. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. No; I have yielded too much already. [Laughter.]

MIDDLE RIO GRANDE CONSERVANCY DISTRICT AND THE PUEBLO INDIANS

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New Mexico under a special order for 15 minutes.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the remarks of the chairman of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee which he delivered in this House yesterday relative to the passage of the bill (S. 700) which was substituted by me in this body for House bill 70, and amended by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], concerning which there has been much discussion on the outside as to the merits of that legislation.

I want to say in the beginning that I believe the gentleman from Michigan is a firm friend of the Indians, with a desire to legislate in behalf of their development.

The legislation had its beginning in my State in order that one of the most important valleys in the State might be developed and reclaimed. New Mexico, or, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has frequently said, "little old New Mexico," is old and is new in its development. This legislation brings us back to the commencement of irrigation in that section of the United States. Irrigation began there not 100 years ago, but perhaps 1,000 or 2,000 years ago. Pueblo Indian lands, now included in this conservancy plan, have been indifferently irrigated for centuries. When the Spaniards first came into this section in 1535 they found the Indians irrigating their lands. History, taken from the archives of Mexico and of Spain, substantiate this statement. The Spaniards came into the State in 1541 and made a settlement therein in 1582. They learned from the Pueblo Indians the method of irrigation. We may safely say that the Pueblo Indians were the first irrigators of lands in the United States.

Both the Indians and the Spaniards had irrigated in this Rio Grande Valley through a series of years running back into the centuries. At one time the amount irrigated was estimated to be as high as 125,000 acres of land, including 8,346 acres of Indian pueblo land. The land has become water-logged, alkaline, and requires drainage. The city of Albuquerque, which is the largest city in the State of New Mexico, and situated in what is known as the middle Rio Grande Valley, in order to reclaim this land formed a conservancy district under the laws of the State of New Mexico and patterned same after the conservancy districts that are now successfully operated in other portions of the United States. They did not come to the Reclamation Bureau or to Congress for funds to carry on their project, but they included in that conservancy district not only the town or city of Albuquerque but also the land up and down the valley, three other important towns, and several minor villages. In all, there are 210,000 acres of land within the district, of which 129,000 acres are to be drained and reclaimed. Included within this land are six Indian pueblos, with their parcels of irrigated land, interspersing white lands.

In order to reclaim and build their drainage canals it is necessary that these canals shall run through the Indian lands, and the Indian lands will be reclaimed thereby. The Indian lands, as I stated, have become water-logged, and the alkaline water has risen to the surface. The production upon these lands is not 25 per cent of normal production. The water-logged condition exists on all the acreage, including the original 8,346 acres of Indian land. The officers of the district came back to the Government, and through the Indian Bureau asked cooperation so that the Indian lands can be included in the plan of flood control and irrigation. A bill was passed in the last session of Congress appropriating $50,000 as the Government's share to survey the Indian lands under the supervision and control of the Indian Department of the Government. The district itself spent something like $300,000. It was found feasible to include the Indian lands. The district has fully complied with the law. Then, when the engineers' reports were made and found satisfactory, the district, through its representatives, came back to this Congress asking that legislation be passed to include the Indian lands, and that the Government through Congress advance, under its regulations and under contracts to be entered into by the department, the Indian proportionate part of the cost to reclaim said Indian land. The bill as presented was the outcome of the plan for legislation. It was not prepared by the Member of Congress on this side. It was not prepared by the Senator from New Mexico on the other side. It was prepared by the Indian Bureau, through its legal department, in conjunction with the officials of the conservancy district. This legislation proposed was brought to the Subcommittee on Appropriations, of which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is chairman. I appeared before that committee. The Senator who introduced the legislation on the other side appeared. The bill was read, thoroughly discussed, every feature therein. It was the purpose of the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs that there should be a gratuity of $500,000 in that bill. The bill as prepared contained that feature. After a discussion in that body a member of that committee from a western State, who has had great experience in Indian affairs, and who tries to protect the Government and at the same time protect the Indians, said, "You people have a gratuity in this bill." All the members of the committee recognized that fact, that there was a gratuity of $500,000 in the bill. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and his committee made their position absolutely plain to Mr. Meritt, to the conservancy district officers, and to everyone present that Congress does not recognize, and had not recognized in any legislation for a period of years, a gratuity in legislation for the Indians, but had placed therein a reimbursable feature.

The bill was presented to the Indian Affairs Committees of the House and of the Senate and thoroughly discussed, but Mr. Meritt, Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, still maintained the position that these Pueblo Indians are honest, faithful, moral Indians, and have not received any large funds from the Government, and that this gratuity should be allowed them. Every member of the committee, as I remember, including the chairman, the gentleman from Michigan, expressed his views. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] read his bill, and some of the members of that committee indorsed his position. When the bill was reported out from the House committee it was reported with the gratuity feature, and in that shape it came before you. It was reported out in the Senate in the same manner.

I recognized the fact that the gentleman from Michigan would offer upon the floor the amendment that was presented, and I want to say to you, as a friend of the Indians, as a citizen of New Mexico, representing that entire State in this body, that there never was fairer legislation than the legislation proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan for the Indians of my State. [Applause.]

Now, Members of the House, I will go further. In a conference held with Mr. Meritt, the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the question was put to him, "Do you regard this bill with the amendment as fair to the Indians?" He replied, "There has not been a fairer piece of legislation in behalf of the Indians presented to the Congress of the United States within a period of 20 years." He was further asked, "Do you believe the reimbursable feature should be in there covering the part of the money advanced by the Government or that it be a gratuity given the Indians?" He said, "Since 1913 your Appropriations Committee of the House have put in the reimbursable feature in legislation of this kind."

Mr. Speaker, the attack that has been made on the legislation embraced in the amendments has been inspired by one John Collier, whom the gentleman from Michigan so aptly described yesterday. Only one purpose has prompted the attack—the question of notoriety, the question of publicity—so that the people who are putting up the funds to sustain Mr. Collier in a position to further create agitation among the Indians may continue to contribute to such funds.

Lawyers out in my State representing Indian societies have been telegraphing back here that the legislation is not proper and is not in behalf of the Indians. One of those lawyers is an upright honorable man, but he has a misconception of the action taken.

Referring back to the legislation and the bill as presented to your body upon the consent day. The bill was passed to include the amendment offered as a substitute by the gentleman from Michigan; I knew before the same was offered that the gentleman from Michigan was going to offer amendments. I had conferred with him, and his amendments were quite satisfactory to me. I thought they were right and proper and that they should be in the bill, and that the bill as so amended should be enacted. I have learned that on consent day you had better not get on the floor and talk about your bill. If your committee has acted upon it and you have a favorable report, you had better let your bill pass without any debate, because there are always present those who are ready to object and who are ready to discuss, and there are those also who are interested in other bills that follow yours on the calendar. They become anxious, and if there is much discussion they are likely to call for the regular order, which is tantamount to an objection, and the result is that your legislation fails.

This legislation is absolutely vital to my State. The climatic conditions out there are very favorable to agriculture, by irrigation, inferior to none in the United States. They can raise five crops of alfalfa in a year. There are 200 growing days each year, and they can produce all kinds of fruits and vegetables. They can raise sugar beets. The 8,346 acres of irrigated Indian land that came with the Indians to the United States under the treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo remain to-day, as the gentleman from Michigan said, protected with a prior water right, and it will not cost the Indians one dollar to have that land reclaimed. The result will be that it will change the value of that land, which is now worth perhaps not to exceed $25 to $30 an acre, into land worth $150 or $200 per acre. But this bill and the action of this House included also the reclamation and irrigation of 15,000 acres of new land; land that had never been touched; that had never been plowed. That land is practically commons to-day, used for grazing, and the grazing fee is practically nothing, perhaps 3 to 5 cents per acre. The value of that land to-day does not exceed $5 or $10 per acre at the most.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Mexico has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for an additional 10 minutes. I am sure the House is very much interested in the statement the gentleman is making.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORROW. These 15,000 acres will at once receive a value under reclamation of from $150 to $200 per acre. The original bill, S. 700, carried a charge of $67.50 per acre against the 15,000 acres of land and the gratuity of $500,000. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan provides that the 8,346 acres that the Indians had occupied and used and irrigated for centuries, which had become practically useless, should not be included in any lien, should be exempted from lien for all time, but that the 15,000 acres of new land to be developed and to be reclaimed should bear a reimbursable charge; this land to be leased and the lease money paid to the Government at some time in the distant future. Is there anything unjust in that?

There are 3,500 Indians, including men, women, and children in these six pueblos. There are only about 700 heads of families. They have 8,346 acres of land, and divided among the heads of families it will give 11.8 acres of irrigated land without any lien to each head of a family. I attended a conference of the Reclamation Committee this morning and they were discussing how much acreage should go to a family under a reclamation project. It was suggested that it depended upon the ability of the family, and would run from 10 to 20 and 40 acres, but not to exceed 80 acres in a unit.

Another thing that presented itself in the circular sent out by Mr. Collier was that three of these pueblos have not sufficient irrigated land upon which to make a living. Mr. Speaker, the Indian Bureau is the guardian of the Indians. If those Indians need additional land they will be the ones to receive first recognition in so far as the newly reclaimed land is concerned. It was represented by Mr. Collier that the Indian Defense Association, which he represents, desired that the new lands be exempted, where cultivated by the Indians, from any charge whatsoever. The Indian Bureau of the Government through its agency can lease the land needed at a nominal price of say $1 or $2 per acre, which it will gladly do, if conditions so require, taking from them no rights whatever.

There is absolutely no radical change in the legislation passed by the House other than with respect to the $500,000 gratuity to the Indians, and the Indians themselves were not clamoring for that. They were satisfied with the legislation, but certain people started to lobby, as the gentleman from Michigan said, and put out certain reports, and then wanted all this land absolutely free.

The gentleman who is lobbying on the outside presented this statement to me. He said:

> Why change, in dealing with these Pueblo Indians, from the fact that this Government heretofore has never made a charge or made it reimbursable until this legislation?

That is absolutely not true, as the records of this body will disclose.

Now, Members of the House, in conclusion I want to say that the committee visited my State this year, led by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] as the chairman. They visited every Indian pueblo that they could reach within the time. We have in the State of New Mexico to-day two schools, one at Albuquerque, with 850 Pueblo children, bright, active, intelligent children; in fact, I believe it is one of the best Indian schools in the United States, at least in the Southwest. In the Indian school at Santa Fe we have 450 Indian pupils. Both of these schools were well taken care of in the funds provided in the Interior Department appropriation bill. Besides those two boarding schools we have other day schools. The committee was sincere in their work in New Mexico in behalf of the Indians. Each member of that committee, as I understand, indorses the position of the gentleman from Michigan. That position, I understand, is the position of your Appropriations Committee, and I, as the Member from New Mexico, say to you Members here that I stand squarely with them for honest, fair, and just legislation in behalf of the Indians, and for honest, fair, and just legislation which will permit my State to go forward, and carry along in this conservancy district the Indians whom Congress has declared citizens, and whom we should bring as soon as possible into the affairs of this Government, and deal with them in the States alone and not in the National Government. [Applause.]

DAWES AND HOOVER

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, may I speak for about 15 minutes?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to speak for about 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARKE. Is that the subject or the time limitation?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the time was when the duties of a Member of the Congress were wholly congressional. So many new duties have been thrust upon a Congressman now that I want to talk just a little bit on that subject. You know, and most Members probably do know, that a Congressman now is expected to be able to tell every one of the home folks who shall write to him on the subject just who is going to be nominated for President by each of the great political parties. I have a great many inquiries along that line, and I make the best answer I can. I have an answer now in my mind with reference to an inquiry regarding the probable nomination at Kansas City in June. Perhaps I might best answer that question, Mr. Speaker, by asking you if you know how smooth is oil? [Laughter.] I do not know, but I do know that Vice President DAWES is as smooth in the political game as my own conception of the smoothness of oil. [Laughter.] Nominally CHARLEY is pledged to promote the candidacy of Governor Lowden for the Republican presidential nomination. Secretly his ablest friends are grooming CHARLEY for the place.

Here is the situation: About one year ago this very week there was held in Washington a conference attended by representatives of the mighty moneyed interests which financed the campaign which led to the nomination of President Coolidge in 1924, and which elected him in that year. The conference regarded Coolidge as first choice for his own succession in the White House, the conclusion being unanimous that those mighty moneyed interests could not find one more faithful to their general cause than President Coolidge had been. But there was an obstacle in the way. That obstacle was the strong sentiment among the American people in opposition to any man filling the office of President three terms in succession. The big men in that conference were not there for the purpose of play. They were there to pave the way for the election of a President who would be as faithful to their interests as President Coolidge had been. And so they decided it would be dangerous to go up against the anti-third-term sentiment with Coolidge as a candidate. Having reached this decision, the conference began casting about for one man best calculated to serve their interests and capacity as President. Many were discussed, but at last the conference voted unanimously in favor of making Herbert Hoover their candidate for the Republican nomination, with the understanding that in due time they would have President Coolidge announce that he would not be a candidate.

This program has been carried out to the letter. In due time President Coolidge announced that he would not be a candidate for a third term. Immediately the great newspapers and magazines, largely owned or controlled by those moneyed interests which supplied the money to nominate and elect Mr. Coolidge in 1924, began spreading the most scientific propaganda in behalf of Hoover, and so successfully that they now have all the other announced candidates on the run.

But now another danger sign has appeared. The big money folks in charge of the Hoover campaign have discovered that in all the Middle West agricultural States the opposition to Hoover is so bitter and so unrelenting as to make very questionable the ability of Hoover to carry those States as against any man the Democrats might nominate against him, provided the Democratic nominee should be friendly to the cause of agriculture.

Now comes CHARLEY DAWES.

CHARLEY DAWES is as fondly loved by big money as is Herbert Hoover, save in one particular. Speaking in my own bucolic language, he has a tough mouth. He might take the bit in his teeth if he should reach the presidential chair and stage a runaway. Of course, he would not run far, but even a little runaway would be annoying to the big money folks who should put one of their own in the presidential chair.

With that one objection brushed away, CHARLEY DAWES will be just as satisfactory to the big money folks as Herbert Hoover could be, and it begins to appear that somebody is doing a little brushing. The higher rises the tide of opposition to Hoover in the Republican agricultural States of the Middle West the nearer CHARLEY DAWES comes to falling heir to the influences which up to this time have decreed that Hoover must be the nominee. No doubt about CHARLEY DAWES being one of the best sweethearts of the general Wall Street interests, and no doubt about him being far stronger among the agricultural elements than Hoover. And so it is easy to estimate the possibility of the ditching of Hoover by the big money folks and the throwing of their strength to DAWES. Not because Hoover is not 100 per cent for the Wall Street program, but only because of the fear that the bitter enmity of the agricultural folks might lose some of those Republican Middle West States to the Republican Party if a proved enemy of the general agricultural interests should be the nominee, and certainly the proof is at hand to show that Mr. Hoover would not favor any legislation for the welfare of agriculture unless such legislation should have been written in the gold room of the house of Morgan.

A year ago CHARLEY DAWES must have looked with a prescient eye down through the days and there discovered the anti-Hoover sentiment among the American farmers. He knew then that Hoover would be the first choice of the money folks who brought about the nomination and election of Coolidge in 1924. And right here Dawes adopted a little program all his own, a program which is leading the observers of political curves to regard CHARLEY DAWES as "smooth as oil." At first he began making a few innocent "agricultural gestures."

They were kindly received. Day by day he grew more aggressive in behalf of legislation in behalf of agriculture. And now, why, at this very moment some of the most astute political observers in the United States do not hesitate to say that the big moneyed folks will ditch Hoover before the opening prayer shall be offered in the Kansas City convention and proceed to start CHARLEY DAWES on the way from the chair of Vice President of the Republic to the chiefest chair in the White House.

What is CHARLEY DAWES saying about it?

He says he is for Lowden.

King Richard said he loved his nephews, but he killed them in the tower.

CHARLEY DAWES says he loves Lowden. At Kansas City he will love DAWES more.

As between Herbert Hoover and CHARLEY DAWES I am 1,000 per cent for DAWES. May the gods not compel me to make a choice between the two. Both are sweethearts of the Morgan-Mellon group of moneyed interests. Both would be obedient to general Wall Street dictation, but Hoover would be more obedient than DAWES. [Applause.]

GENERAL CLAIMS BILL

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9285) to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I understood the committee wanted a quorum present.

Mr. TILSON. We can have a vote on going into committee.

Mr. BLANTON. All right.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is not a quorum present, and object to the vote on that ground.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 331, not voting 102, as follows:

The doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9285, with Mr. LAGUARDIA in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. PEERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PEERY: On page 2, in lines 8, 9, and 10, strike out the words "to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine any claim liability for which is recognized under this section if the amount of the claim does not exceed $5,000," and insert in lieu thereof "to consider, adjust, and compromise any claim liability for which is recognized under this section if the amount of the claim does not exceed $3,000."

Mr. PEERY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say that in offering this amendment I do so with the utmost deference to the chairman and the other members of this committee. I have a very high regard for their ability and their statesmanship. I am in sympathy with the general purpose of this bill and with the objects sought to be accomplished.

If, as has been stated in the report of the committee, the machinery of Congress has broken down and does not properly function in the matter of determining these claims and adjudicating these claims, then the Congress should set up some machinery that will afford this relief to the people.

The bill proposes to confer jurisdiction upon certain existing tribunals for the adjudication of certain classes of claims, and to confer upon them authority to hear and determine these claims.

In brief analysis the bill proposes as follows:

First. To confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to adjudicate all tort claims in excess of $10,000 for damage to property, with no limit as to the amount for which the Government may be sued.

Second. Concurrent jurisdiction is conferred upon the Court of Claims and the United States district courts to adjudicate all tort claims for damage to property in amounts from $5,000 up to $10,000.

Third. Jurisdiction is conferred upon the Employees' Compensation Commission to adjudicate all personal injury and death claims. A maximum amount for which suit may be brought for personal injury or death is fixed at $7,500.

Fourth. Jurisdiction is conferred on the head of each executive department and independent establishment to adjudicate tort claims for damage to property where the amount does not exceed $5,000.

Under existing law, which is the act passed in 1922, the heads of executive departments are now authorized to hear and settle claims up to $1,000. This bill proposes to extend their jurisdiction up to $5,000.

I think the bill goes too far in this respect, and it is to limit this jurisdiction to $3,000 that I offer this amendment.

I object also to the provision of the bill which confers upon the heads of executive departments power and authority to adjudicate these claims. I am quite willing for the heads of executive departments to be given the authority and the power to adjust and compromise claims up to $3,000, but I am not willing to confer upon the head of an executive department the right and power to adjudicate as a court the claim of any party against the Government.

The general purpose of this bill is for Congress to transfer the exercise of judicial functions to other jurisdictions. It is fundamental that any judicial tribunal should be fair and impartial, and when you confer upon the head of an executive department the power to adjudicate you are conferring the power of adjudication upon a partisan, because it is within his department that the basis of the claim arises—damage resulting from negligence on the part of some employee or agent of his department. I think to confer the power of adjudication upon the head of an executive department is not only wrong in principle, but will prove bad in practice.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEERY. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Suppose a claimant is not satisfied with the adjudication of one of these executive departments; what is his remedy?

Mr. PEERY. Under this bill he has to come back to Congress and present his claim and ask Congress to pass upon it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And Congress or the committee will immediately say, "You have very little standing in court to-day because the department has already passed judgment on the claim."

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEERY. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. PEERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERHILL. You do not alter the situation one single iota by the passage of this bill?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Except you have a record staring you in the face.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The committee has such a record now in every instance.

Mr. PEERY. In answer to the gentleman from Alabama, I think the practical effect will be that when the claimant has gone before the head of an executive department and has submitted his claim and has obtained an adjudication or finding from that department, when he comes back to Congress, the practical effect will be that Congress will say to him that he has had his day in court.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEERY. I will.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What language in the bill does the gentleman think gives the department the power of adjudication in a judicial sense. I do not see much difference in the language to be stricken out and the language the gentleman offers to substitute.

Mr. PEERY. I will say to the gentleman that the bill as originally submitted, page 2, reads "exclusive authority is hereby conferred upon the head of each department to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine." It does not use the word adjudicate, it is true.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman's amendment reads to "consider, adjust, and compromise."

Mr. PEERY. Yes; I leave out the word determine, which carries the idea of adjudication.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And it limits the amount to $3,000. I am in sympathy with that; I think $5,000 is a very large sum to put in the hands of a head of the bureau. We get a wrong idea of values here when we appropriate in millions and millions of dollars, but as applied to the individual $5,000 is a large sum of money, whereas collectively for the Nation it does not seem to be. I hope the committee will consider a lower limit.

Mr. PEERY. In that connection I would like to say that the amount under existing law which gives the Federal court jurisdiction is $3,000. Under this bill they propose to confer jurisdiction on the Federal court and the Court of Claims from $5,000 to $10,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. In contract cases.

Mr. PEERY. Yes; and in torts you are introducing a new instrumentality in the determination of claims. Why not let the Federal court have jurisdiction, as it now has, in excess of $3,000, and limit the jurisdiction of the heads of the executive departments to $3,000 and then give concurrent jurisdiction to the Federal district court and the Court of Claims from $3,000 to $10,000?

This bill involves the transfer of the jurisdiction from Congress to other tribunals. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] in his address upon this bill some days ago was asked by me if he considered it wise in principle to transfer the exercise of judicial determination from the Congress to the executive departments, and his reply in substance was that in his Commonwealth originally the three functions—executive, legislative, and judicial—were exercised by the general court, but that they had gotten away from that. It took them 150 years to get away from it, and now the best line of thought was not to keep the legislative and judicial separate.

I do not agree with my colleague upon this proposition or upon this principle.

Mr. John Randolph Tucker, to whom the gentleman from Massachusetts refers in a most complimentary way, in his work on the Constitution in discussing the division of powers under the Constitution into the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, quotes from Baron Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws, as follows:

When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person or in the same body of magistrates there can be no liberty, because apprehensions may arise lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws to execute them in a tyrannical manner.

Again, there is no liberty if the judiciary power be not separated from the legislative and executive. Were it joined with the legislative the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control, for the judge would be then the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power the judge might behave with violence and oppression. There would be an end of everything were the same man or the same body, whether of the nobles or of the people, to exercise those three powers, that of enacting laws, that of executing the public resolutions, and of trying the causes of individuals.

Then he says:

The influence of Montesquieu's maxim upon the Federal Constitution is not left to conjecture. Mr. Madison discusses this subject at length in the Federalist and vindicates the Federal Constitution against any material violation of the maxim.

The right of the claimant whose claim does not exceed $5,000 to have an impartial tribunal to hear and adjudicate his claim is equal and coexistent with the right of the claimant having a claim in excess of $5,000 to have a fair and impartial judge. This smaller claimant does not get such tribunal under the proposal of this bill. Under the bill as proposed he must take his claim to a tribunal that is presided over by an officer and a partisan of the Government. The bill, as originally drawn, proposed to give to this officer of the Government exclusive jurisdiction. The provision for exclusive jurisdiction has been stricken out, but the practical effect is virtually the same. For, if this bill should become a law, when a claimant meets with an adverse adjudication at the hands of the head of an executive department to which he must go with his claim for adjudication, the Congress as a practical matter would say to him that he had had his day in court. In my judgment it would be far better for Congress to set up an additional tribunal, a junior court of claims if you please, to hear and determine these claims up to $5,000, rather than to adopt the provision contained in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I am going to try once more to present to the House the reason for this section and ask their support because if you start to amend the bill to meet every exigency, every remote case, every possible expediency the mind of man may conjure up, the bill is not going to be worth anything.

The reason for limiting it to $5,000 is this: You would be surprised to find that in our committee the most of these claims up to $5,000 are brought by poor people and a large proportion of them are brought by ignorant people.

A Member of Congress can not practice before the courts on such cases and consequently the claimant has got to hire a lawyer. In their ignorance they are just as liable to fall into the hands of some unprincipled person and be obliged to leave the case to them on a contingent fee. All you lawyers know that under a contingent fee the lawyer will get a larger sum than he would on a straight fee.

A Member of Congress can go before the department—I do not care which department—that is, he can present for his constituent a claim, and he can present the evidence for him, and if the claim is allowed the constituent gets the full amount. If you reduce it to $3,000, what will be the result? These ignorant people, whom I mention, will take their cases to the courts under a contingent fee, and those that have a claim of $5,000 will receive $3,000 or less. It is no reflection at all upon the courts, it is no reflection at all upon those who appear before the courts. It is simply that this is a better way of securing equity, and we must remember all through the discussion that our committee is trying to act in the capacity of an equity court rather than a court of law, if you can separate the two, and I hope you will. We do not act upon the strict interpretation of all the laws that are laid down, as a court does. So in these small cases it is much better for the client, it is much better for the constituent, it is much better for you, that they be allowed to present their claims to the departments up to $5,000. A claim for a larger amount than that you would be justified in taking to the courts.

Furthermore, do not be afraid of the bugaboo or straw man which is conjured up here to be torn apart that the department is going to turn down every claim that comes before it, and that after it has turned it down and they come back to the Committee on Claims for adjudication that the Committee on Claims and Congress is simply going to take the action of the department and confirm it. At the present time the committee is guided by the decision or report of the department, and Congress itself time and time again holds up a bill on the floor of the House which has an adverse report from the department. So you see you have the same situation existing to-day with reference to the decision of the department that you would have under the provisions of this bill, not a bit different. If you think you are aggrieved or injured, you can still come to Congress and have the committee make an equitable adjudication of the claim rather than have it passed upon under an absolute interpretation of the law by the courts.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, from my observation and experience with the heads of bureaus, I am more than willing that they should have jurisdiction of the amount stipulated in this bill. From my experience I believe that our constituents would get just as fair and probably more liberal settlement than they would through the Claims Committee under the present system. I am not afraid of submitting these claims up to $5,000 to the heads of the bureaus. Some one has said that they might be partisan or prejudiced because the claim arose in their particular department. The heads of the bureaus will probably have no knowledge of the facts in connection with any of these claims until they have been presented. When a man attains a position in the Government service where he gets to be the head of a bureau I am willing to trust him to pass on the claims which will be referred to him under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Although I do not agree with the proponent of the amendment—that it changes the meaning of the bill to any considerable extent—I do want to express myself as being in favor of limiting the jurisdiction. I thought originally that it should be limited to $2,000. The amendment puts the limit at $3,000. I think that is better than $5,000; $3,000, I think, is large enough to leave to a department head. You have no provision in the bill here, even, for authorizing anybody to adopt uniform rules to guide department heads.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have an amendment which will be offered as soon as this is disposed of which will take care of that feature.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Very well. That will be an improvement. Unless your amendment covers it, you have no provision for a review by anyone for errors of law. The department head may in his decision make errors of law, and his decision can not be reviewed at all.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The Committee on Claims and the House of Representatives in almost all of these cases make errors of law, because we are not a court of law; we are a court of equity.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is another thing brought to my mind, since the gentleman has mentioned it. There was a good deal of loose talk when the bill was under consideration before about Congress exercising a judicial function in passing on claims. When a bill is before the House the constitutionality of which is in question, and Members get up and argue for and against the bill because of its constitutionality or unconstitutionality, do Members then exercise judicial powers or legislative powers? In acting upon the bill before us to reimburse somebody for loss of property or life, do we exercise judicial or legislative powers? It is the latter, of course, without question, and in order that we may rid ourselves of this inaccurate use of terms let me cite you an authority from the Supreme Court itself defining what constitutes the exercise of judicial power. In the Muskrat case, volume 219, page 356, I quote from Mr. Justice Miller. He said:

> The judicial power is the power of a court to decide and pronounce judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision.

In other words, the exercise of judicial power has three elements—first, decision; second, pronouncing of judgment; and third, carrying into effect that judgment by a proper writ.

Now, Congress does not do that at any time, and so in none of the acts that we do here, whether passing on the constitutionality or validity of proposed legislation before us, or allowing a claim, do we exercise anything but legislative power. So let us get rid of that, and when we confer upon some officer in a department the power to pass upon a claim and transmit to Congress his finding, that is not the exercise of judicial power. Not a dollar of this money can be paid to any of these claimants until the Congress makes the necessary appropriation therefor.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As I understand, the gentleman is simply concerned about the amount, and is not concerned about the language to be employed?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not see much difference between the language in the bill and the language in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, may I have five additional minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not think there is much difference in the effect of the language, to be frank, between what is in the bill and what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PEERY] proposed in his amendment. I do favor the limitation in the amount in this amendment, and will vote for the amendment for that reason, not because of any changes made as to power it confers upon the chief in a department.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Would it not be better if the gentleman is going to accept the amendment simply to strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert "$3,000"? If you keep on emasculating this bill it will not be worth anything. I will not support the amendment.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I know you will not support it. I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia to change his amendment and limit it to the amount.

The last time the bill was up for discussion there was a great deal of talk of what foreign governments had done along this line and what various States had done in permitting the individual to sue the State. Massachusetts, for instance, was cited as a shining example. I had the legislative reference bureau in the Library of Congress to look up this point, and I find that only a very few States of the Union have laws permitting suits in tort.

The progressive State of Massachusetts, for instance, although there is a section of the code there giving jurisdiction to the superior court to hear claims of all kinds, I understand the courts have construed it as simply conferring jurisdiction, but not the power or right to entertain suits against the State in such cases without further legislation; and the Legislature of Massachusetts as late as 1924, as you will find in chapter 390 of the session laws of 1924, passed a law conferring upon the attorney general power to pass on all claims up to $1,000, and they are to be paid providing the legislature appropriates the money. Upon claims involving over $1,000 the attorney general investigates them and makes his recommendation accordingly to the Legislature of Massachusetts. But the other States that have laws along this line are very limited. I am simply referring to this in connection with what I said the other day when this was up, that we should go slow. I am sympathetic toward the general purposes of the bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] and his committee have done a lot of hard and conscientious work on the bill, and I want to see them get something through; but as this is a new venture I appeal to you to first learn how to walk before you try to run, and I am sure it will be a safer development toward the things you want to accomplish if you go slow instead of attempting to take the whole leap at once. I understand amendments will be offered to limit the amount the Court of Claims and the court can hear and they should be adopted.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. In view of what the gentleman has said about the action of Massachusetts, I would submit that the valuable institution known as the legislative bureau in the Library has not gone the full limit in supplying the information.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman will take his own time in explaining that. The gentleman will concede that they have not gone the whole limit, as might be inferred from speeches made here the other day.

Mr. LUCE. Yes; I prefer to take my own time, but I supposed the gentleman would be willing to be corrected in an error of statement.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Well, if I made a misstatement as to the law of Massachusetts I will yield to be corrected.

Mr. LUCE. In 1887 it was declared that the statute passed in 1879 had given jurisdiction over all claims against the Commonwealth, whether at law or in equity.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is what I said. That is merely jurisdictional, and does not confer, so the courts have held, at least, the power to determine those cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. McKEOWN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. McKEOWN. On this amendment to reduce the amount from $5,000 to $3,000 I did not get the exact wording of the amendment; but on the question of amount I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that $3,000 is a jurisdictional amount that makes a case removable from a State court to a Federal court on account of diverse citizenship. It would appear to me to be fair in this legislation to take that amount to determine the jurisdiction in the settlement of claims. If we require our cases to be removed from State courts to Federal courts when the amount exceeds $3,000, then it does look to me as though $3,000 ought to be the amount to be fixed in this particular instance.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman is in error. It does not require up to $5,000.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am trying to get the amount fixed. I understood this amendment was on the amount which the department can settle.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It does.

Mr. McKEOWN. Well, I want to limit the amount at which a department may settle to $3,000, because in a lawsuit in a State court between men of different citizenships, $3,000 is the jurisdictional point, and if you go over $3,000 they can transfer the suit to a Federal court. That amount seems to me to be the reasonable amount to fix here.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is as to cases on contract but not as to cases in tort. I am afraid the gentleman did not hear my explanation as to why the amount is fixed as it is in the bill. It is solely in the interest of the poor man that we have fixed the amount at $5,000.

Mr. McKEOWN. But there are two sides to the proposition. If $3,000 is the amount to be sued for in a State court, where there is a diversity of citizenship, either in tort or on contract, then $3,000 ought to be the amount at which a department may settle a claim. You ought not to make a discrimination in favor of a department of the Government as against the jurisdiction given to State courts. That is the point I am trying to stress. If you can not risk State courts having jurisdiction of cases involving more than $3,000, where there is a diversity of citizenship, then it seems to me $3,000 is the proper amount at which a department may settle.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PEERY) there were—ayes 21, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERHILL: On page 2, in lines 12, 13, and 14, strike out the following: "For payment out of appropriations that may be authorized by Congress therefor."

And in line 17, after the word "made," insert the following: "Appropriations for the payment of such claims are hereby authorized and payment thereof may be made to the extent Congress may approve such claims by the granting of appropriations therefor."

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, this is to correct a mistake which was made when this bill was up before. I accepted an amendment which struck out the word "made" and inserted the word "authorized." I thought it was just a change of a word which did not amount to anything, and this amendment takes care of the situation. I will say for the information of the Members that it was drawn by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MADDEN] and has his approval and support.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 2, line 10, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask whether this is not subject to a point of order, a similar amendment having just been voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts make a point of order?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I do.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be heard on that. The gentleman from Virginia offered an amendment which changed the text of lines 8, 9, and 10, while the amendment I am offering simply changes the figures at the end of line 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair overrules the point of order, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSEYER: On page 2, in line 10, strike out the sign and figures "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$3,000."

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia not only changed the figures but changed the text of lines 8, 9, and 10. My amendment simply limits the jurisdiction of the heads of departments to $3,000 instead of $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I was necessarily detained from the House, and I did not hear all of the debate in relation to this subject. May I ask the chairman of the committee whether the words "exclusive jurisdiction" are now in the text or not?

Mr. UNDERHILL. They are not in the text.

Mr. MONTAGUE. They are left out?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I desire to concur in the motion made by the gentleman from Iowa. It is a very wholesome amendment. I think to give authority to the heads of departments the power to adjust claims of $5,000 and less is too much.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the amendment which was just adopted providing that payment of claims adjusted by heads of departments may be made to the extent that Congress may approve such claims by granting appropriations therefor?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; I have caught that in a way. The point I desire to make is this: I would like very much to see something done that would remedy the condition which now confronts claimants of the country. However, I doubt if this bill will do it. Of course, I do not mean to say anything against the honest and indefatigable effort on the part of the committee reporting this bill to bring that about.

In the first place, you will never get, except in most isolated cases, a department to give a judgment for $5,000.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman allow a correction there?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Of course, that is an expression of opinion of mine.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman allow me to present him with the facts? Out of 1,000 reports from the department, while a department never recommends any particular amount, it never opposes the recommendation of $5,000.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But you leave this to the determination of the department, up to $5,000.

Mr. UNDERHILL. We leave the determination of a claim with them up to $5,000. They may hear the evidence and they may present the facts later to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I repeat my assertion that in very rare instances will a department head certify in favor of the claimant. The inertia of the Government is against the claim when you start. You have to fight your way at the beginning. You are not before a judicial tribunal. You are not meeting an open-minded agent who is to dispose of the matter. I mean no reflection whatever. They represent the Government and they understand that their duty is to be one of saving the Government, rather than to render justice to the claimant.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Would not the same argument apply to the Members of the Congress? They represent the Government also.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, when they are seeking claims it may not apply. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. I do not mean the Members of the Congress who are seeking to have claim bills allowed; I mean the members of the Committee on Claims and the Members of Congress generally in the Committee of the Whole, and the question is whether or not they will allow a claim presented by one of their colleagues acting in the same capacity.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is a very interesting question the gentleman puts, and it involves a field of psychology that I do not wish to enter [laughter], save to observe that Congress will lend a more willing ear to these claims than the head of a department or a subordinate under the head of a department.

I want to see some action, so there can be some remedy, up to an amount of $3,000 or $5,000, or whatever the amount may be, but if you make the amount large, greater will be the preoccupation of the mind of the particular agent to refuse the claim. For this reason I hope it will be made somewhat reasonable, so that his reaction will be more favorable to a just claim.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say just a word along this line. Under the provisions of this bill if I, personally—and I do not know of a man in Congress who has a better knowledge of the proceedings of the departments—if I had a claim of $7,000 against the Government, I would go to the department and take my chances on the department giving me an award of $5,000 and give up the other $2,000, rather than to take any other action.

I will ask the ranking minority member of the committee to bear me out in the statement that in 90 per cent of the cases where we refer them to the departments for reports, the reports come back, as a rule, favorable and with this statement, "The department does not think the amount requested excessive." Further than this, the department has no real right to go.

Now, do not be misled. The departments have used some of our Members roughly at times, according to their own feelings, but as a rule the Members of the House have had equitable and just and fair treatment by the departments, and I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAMSEYER) there were—ayes 16, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, the committee will recall that in the debate on this bill 10 days ago that I offered an amendment, which was accepted by the chairman of the Committee on Claims, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], and which was then adopted by the committee. It was, on line 1, of page 2, and inserted the word "negligent" before the word "omission."

Upon reflection I am of the opinion that the amendment should not have been adopted. The original language was "wrongful act or omission." I am satisfied that the word "wrongful" modifies "omission" and therefore the word "negligent" should not be used. Changed, as I have indicated, the liability is for a negligent or wrongful act or wrongful omission.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that the previous action of the committee on adopting this amendment be vacated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to vacate the action taken by the committee, when the bill was previously before the committee, in agreeing to an amendment at page 2, line 1, inserting the word "negligent" before the word "omission." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 1, strike out "(10 Statutes at Large, page 481)" and insert in lieu thereof "section 227, title 31, United States Code."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, strike out lines 12, 13, and 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Section 3. Section 250, title 28, United States Code (sec. 145 of the Judicial Code as amended) is amended by adding after the third subsection thereof a new subsection 4, to read as follows."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I offer another amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 17, after the word "claim," strike out "exceed $5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "is in excess of $5,000 but does not exceed $25,000."

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer that for the purpose of limiting the amount under section 3 of this bill. Under the bill suit may be brought in excess of $5,000 up to any amount. We in the committee have had claims of a million dollars or more. I think as this is an experiment that it would be possibly better to go a little slow and limit the amount to $25,000 and consider all property claims in Congress that are over $25,000, and for that reason I have offered the amendment.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, in reference to this amendment I can see the drift of the gentleman's contention, but the facts are as follows: Most of these matters which come before the Committee on Claims involve comparatively small amounts of money and give us very little trouble excepting the time it takes to look them up and adjudicate them, but when it comes to large amounts in the Claims Committee the committee has no machinery nor has it the general atmosphere of the court to guide it.

Now, you never have limited the amount in contract cases. We passed that law many years ago and the sky is the limit there up to any amount in contract. In other words, a big manufacturer with plenty of money and a legal firm to look after its interest can come before the court and sue for an unlimited amount of money on a disputed contract. Then we passed a law known as the admiralty bill and you did not limit the amount.

I suppose the new California cost several million dollars. I do not anticipate that the California is going to be damaged by United States vessels or in its trips east and west and west and east it is going to be damaged in the Panama Canal, but suppose she was totally destroyed. There is no limit to the amount they can sue for in court. Now, the difficulty is you are going to throw into the Committee on Claims and into Congress the adjudication of matters involving tremendous amounts of money when you do not provide the proper machinery nor the proper atmosphere with which to safeguard the interests of the claimants as well as the Nation. If you are going to reduce the amount, I trust you will not go as low as $25,000, but make a reasonable sum, but I personally object to any limitation.

Time and time again I have been asked by Members of Congress, my colleagues, who have come before the committee asking that their case be referred to the Court of Claims or to the Admiralty Court, and saying, "Can't you trust your courts?" Every time I have offered an objection my good friends of the legal fraternity will hold up to me the integrity, the honesty, the ability, and the efficiency of the courts. This afternoon it has been asked, "Can not we trust the departments?" I say that if you can trust the courts up to $25,000 you can trust them in any amount that may come before them. [Applause.]

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. How many bills are now before the committee involving a property loss of more than $35,000?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Very few.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Can the gentleman tell the number? Leaving aside post-office claims.

Mr. UNDERHILL. In 1922 we had claims which were over $15,000,000, and out of that amount I can remember but six that were for more than a million or a million and a half or two million dollars.

Mr. LUCE. Is it not true that in the case of a decision by the Court of Claims, if there be any suspicion of a miscarriage of justice, Congress has always the whip hand through the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The Committee on Appropriations of course can exercise its power, and I am going to differentiate between the word "power" and the word "right." As a layman I have enough respect for courts to believe that their decisions should be followed, but they have not always been followed in the past, and the Committee on Appropriations can refuse absolutely to make an appropriation.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I understand very fully the difficulties that attach to the present situation, and also the trouble that the Committee on Claims has had in performing its duties. I have thought that a very good disposition of the problem would be to create a commission which would have jurisdiction of all such claims as are described in the bill, with authority to report to Congress. That would relieve the necessity of Congress taking any preliminary action. However, I have no sort of objection to allowing the department heads to pass on such claims as we have talked about in the last few minutes, although I would have preferred to see the amount restricted to $3,000.

I rose to say just a few words to the committee on what we are proposing to do, so far as tort claims are concerned. I may preface my observations by the statement that ordinarily no sovereign anywhere on either side of the water, either the Government of England or the Government of the United States, or the government of any state, submits to being sued indiscriminately in actions of tort for damages. I say this without having made any extensive examination. It is proposed by this bill to expose our Government to proceedings of that character. The courts are to be given jurisdiction to consider actions of tort where the amounts involved are without limit, and as suggested a moment ago by the gentleman from North Carolina. That is what is proposed. Let us see how the claims are to arise. Let us see how very broad is the scope of the proposition. Whenever any official or employee of the Government is guilty of negligence or of any wrongful act or omission, consequent upon which there is damage to any property, the person injured may bring his suit and effect a recovery, and he can do it, whether the amount be $5,000 or $5,000,000, or any amount.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. In a moment. Let us think of the position in which that places the Government. The Government has something like half a million officials and employees, and whenever one single one of those people is negligent or is in default because of some wrongful act, then the claimant who is injured or who charges that he is injured can look beyond the employee and bring suit against the Government. Is that a safe thing to do as broadly as that?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I would like to ask the gentleman two questions. In the first place, is not that the practice in private as between one citizen and another, and is it not the practice of the Government as against the citizen; and second, why differentiate between actions of tort and actions on contract or in admiralty against the Government?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. So far as the last branch of the question is concerned, there is a definiteness about contracts that does not exist in effect to the other claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Answering the first branch of the question, there is this to be said, that the practice of governments from the very start, which is pretty universal, is due to knowledge that there is an inclination to find against a government, which is better able to pay, than against an individual.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That may be general as far as juries are concerned, but does that inclination to which the gentleman refers prevail in the case of a trained judge?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is the premise on which the world has generally proceeded up to this time. So far as I know, the Government of Great Britain does not submit to be sued by anybody who chooses to bring an action of tort against it; and that is the attitude of nearly all of the States of the Union, conservative States and progressive States. Take my own State as an illustration. This sort of thing would not be permitted.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman stand for a correction?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Then I would say to him that in England, if any person has in point of property a just demand upon the King, he may petition him in his court of chancery, by what is called a petition of right. There the chancellor will administer right theoretically as a matter of grace and not compulsorily. In fact, right is administered as a matter of constitutional duty.

The gentleman spoke of his own State of Virginia. Is it not true that the Old Dominion has remained pretty well within the limits of the Constitution and has not engaged in all lines of business as the Government of the United States has?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. My State is now diversifying its business to an enormous extent. We have a great many road officials in Virginia. We are not willing when a road official is guilty of some negligence in a county or has been guilty of some default, not negligent in character, to permit a person who claims injury occasioned thereby to his property to go into court and assert his claim against the State.

I have not got time to illustrate fully, but let me give one or two illustrations so as to show what is proposed to be done. The Government has thousands and increasing thousands of prohibition officers. If any one of those officials is guilty of any sort of negligence, or if he is guilty of an affirmative or wrongful act, without a warrant, if you pass this bill, a claim can be set up against the Government and asserted by judicial proceedings.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Providing it is in property damage.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The language of the act is clear, that if the loss or damage was occasioned by a wrongful act or omission of any officer or employee of the United States, then no plea can be offered to the institution and the maintenance of the action.

Take another illustration: We have now thousands of people engaged in carrying the mail, either on rural routes or on star routes. If this bill becomes a law and it appears that any one of those people has by some act of negligence or some wrongful act which you would not perhaps thus describe, it will permit a person alleging that he has suffered injury to go into court and recover if he can.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If the gentleman will read the bill he will find that it does not do that. There is an exemption to that extent.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. No. There is no exemption that contradicts what I have stated. I will read the language here to show to what the exemption applies:

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman also read the very first section of the bill, where it says:

Subject to the limitations of this act, the Government of the United States authorizes the payment of claims on account of damage to or loss of privately owned property.

It is distinctly set forth, "property." It does not allow damages in other directions.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Well, there are hardly any bounds to the interpretation of that provision. What I say stands. You are proposing here to allow actions against the Government in such a variety of cases that nobody can imagine what will occur. And incidentally we are doing what? Encouraging all sorts of people who are interested more now in doing that kind of thing than ever in the history of the Government, to corral such claims for the purpose of urging them and earning fees. I am not going to offer an amendment, but I think this subject is entitled to much consideration by gentlemen who have given more attention to it than I have, including the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], for whom I have high respect. I would like to invite the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box], whom I equally respect. To repeat what I said at the outset, it is my belief we could effectively rid Congress of all the harassing labor now involved, and enable deserving people to secure swift and satisfactory determination of their claims by constituting an impartial commission to consider claims and report to Congress its findings. [Applause.]

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if the membership of the House now engaged in the study of this very important bill will do me the honor to recall what I said in opening my remarks on a previous occasion, they will recall that I said it was going much further than Congress had ever before manifested a willingness to go. I still think so. I approached its consideration with grave concern. I am glad that the thoughtful men of this House are giving it their best attention. I believe the legislation ought to be enacted. I am not convinced that it is free from difficulty, but I believe that a situation as serious as we have must be dealt with. Much of the discussion we have had to-day by those thoughtful gentlemen whose remarks have contributed so much to the understanding of what is in the bill here has been from the standpoint of government. I believe my colleagues on the committee—and I think those Members of the House who pay any attention to my work on the committee—know that I do not overlook the Government's side of these questions. Perhaps I am a little bit too conservative in that direction; but while that may be true, I want the membership to remember that there is a very high and important sense in which we are obligated to look at the other side of this question. There are literally hundreds—I may say thousands—of claims that I verily believe to be just but which get no consideration. Men can not do things without making mistakes, and you can not confer responsibility without sometimes inflicting wrong, and sometimes wrong results from trusting men. But you can not refuse to grant any relief because there is danger of mistake. There is not a court in the land that does not commit error. None of us is free from error. Therefore we must recognize that we have to use faulty human instrumentalities in our efforts to do right by the claimants—thousands of claimants—as well as by our Government.

This is new legislation in principle in the main. We have some minor bills, but this is the big affair. The Government of the United States is now maintaining contact with its people in a great many ways in which it did not have contact heretofore. It has thousands of trucks carrying mail; it has like numbers of Army and Navy trucks, and hundreds of airplanes.

It has many business contacts not covered by routine law, and it is constantly creating obligations of payment not provided for by law. We have, I think, 500,000 or 600,000 employees using these agencies and distributed and working among the 115,000,000 or 120,000,000 of our people, many of whom are very weak, indeed, when they come to match strength with their Government.

Gentlemen, when we sit on your Committee on Claims we try to protect the Government. Some of us try very hard and, perhaps, lean over a little bit too far that way; but at the same time we want to exercise whatever discretion we have in doing justice by everybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. PEERY. Is it not true that under this bill damages for personal injury or death are limited to $7,500, while there is no limit for damages to property?

Mr. BOX. That is true. I want to call your attention, gentlemen, to this, and I want you to keep it in mind in whatever you conclude to do with the legislation we have presented to you, that the Congress retains control of these claims completely. I am sure there is nobody on the committee who has any such pride in the work he has done in the committee as to want that to influence anybody to pass legislation that ought not to be passed. After your departments and after your compensation commission have passed on claims we do not tell the Treasury to pay them. We say send it back to Congress with a summary of the evidence, and with the reasons for its allowance. If you think your Appropriations Committee is overburdened, you can, I suggest to my highly esteemed friend from Virginia, have a joint committee of the two Houses, or you could enlarge your House Committee on Claims and through it do the work of reviewing these claims and the action taken upon them. You can do that if you want to relieve the Appropriations Committee of the work of reviewing what these departments have done. If you want to provide an agency of your own, wholly within your own control, you could do that under this bill by the organization of a new committee or the extension of the powers of one of your present committees.

Your Committee on Claims has the right to report appropriations for claims. If you pass this legislation you would still have the power to control this business according to your judgment. If you believe that the legislation is not adequate, that it is unsafe or unjust to the Government or unjust to the claimants, we are still retaining in Congress the power to dispose of them. The Committee on Claims, or a division of it, could pass on these reports of the hearing and tentative allowance or disallowance and report back to this House in order that it may exercise its discretion concerning the claims.

This question is very serious. It weighs on the conscience of lawyers or Members of this House who see what goes on in that committee and how many people are without redress.

I say to you in all candor that I believe this will multiply the number of claims. I think I am under obligation to say that, because the question is probably in the minds of my colleagues.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have great respect, as all of us have, for the opinion of the gentleman from Texas. One of the things that has been bothering me about this bill is the provision which gives exclusive authority to the head of a department to——

Mr. BOX (interposing). I think the word "exclusive" has been eliminated.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, whether that is stricken out or not, it does not change the proposition. You give authority under this bill to the heads of departments to try absolutely and determine the issues of claims up to the sum of $5,000, without any right of appeal anywhere. That is final, conclusive, and res adjudicata.

Mr. BOX. I think not. I think the gentleman is in error as to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In effect, it seems to me, that is it, and that is the reason why I ask for the candid judgment of the gentleman from Texas. In the bill you provide:

> No claim that, prior to the time of the passage of this act, has been rejected or reported on adversely by any court or department or establishment authorized to hear and determine the same, shall be considered under this title.

Of course, the gentleman's answer to that is that the Committee on Claims would probably still have jurisdiction of that matter, that they are not divested of jurisdiction to hear it; but is it not the opinion of the gentleman from Texas that it would greatly handicap the possibilities of a claimant ever securing any consideration whatever from the Claims Committee if one of these heads of departments had turned down the claim, although the head of a department might be in error on the law and the facts as to the righteousness of the claim?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. I think there are two or three things involved in the gentleman's intelligent question. I think, first, that the limitation imposed upon the power of a department is not in any sense a limitation upon the power of Congress to deal with the question after it has been before a department. Next I do believe that when a department has passed on one of these claims it will be more difficult to get it reopened and gone into carefully and thoroughly than if it were being done at first instance, where a department had never passed on it, otherwise this bill would serve no purpose. I think, however, that if it were apparent that any of the parties had not received justice that the Committee on Claims, if it properly performed its duty, would reopen the claim and that no party would be left without redress. It would make it more difficult. It would add weight to the side in favor of which the department ruled, the view on which they had decided the case. I think it would not bar your action, but would simply make it more difficult.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question along that line?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. Is it not the present rule of the committee on a tort claim arising out of the negligence of one of the Government's employees not to consider the claim if the department reports adversely upon it?

Mr. BOX. I do not think it is true that we refuse to consider such a claim. I think we give great weight to such a report.

Mr. NEWTON. I want to say to the gentleman, that has been my experience before the Claims Committee of the House in the last Congress. They would take the judgment of an assistant solicitor or a solicitor of one of the departments as being absolutely final and conclusive on all questions of law and fact, and a Member was absolutely powerless before the committee to get a hearing upon such a claim. That is the experience I have had before the gentleman's committee.

Mr. BOX. I am sorry the gentleman has had that experience. I want to say for myself, and I think I speak for a number of my colleagues, that what a department says is not conclusive upon me, and I think it is not usually conclusive upon the committee, though it makes it harder.

Mr. NEWTON. Then is the rule being applied to one Member in one way and to another Member in another way?

Mr. BOX. I can not go into all of those things. I do not know what claims the gentleman has. I know for one thing that the committee can not do one-tenth of the business it ought to do and do it right.

Mr. NEWTON. That is the reason I am for this bill. I want to take part of the work away from the committee.

Mr. BOX. If I may take the House into my confidence for just a moment concerning some claims that have been referred to the subcommittee of which I have the honor to be chairman, and I have had other experiences like it, involving several hundred thousand dollars and involving a lot of mixed-up and disputed transactions, my colleagues and I get together for a few hours whenever we find time and have some hearings and do our best to ferret out the rights involved in these claims, realizing all the time that we are not able to go to the bottom of them and do justice either by the claimants or by the Government. I remember yet another case that came before this House where the claim involved about $1,400,000. The gentleman from Texas reached one conclusion and a majority of the committee reached another. After spending many hours in going through them, I stated to the House that if I, as a responsible lawyer, were undertaking to adjudicate these claims I would want several months probably to ferret out all of the controverted facts and learn the truth in order to do right concerning them.

Now, gentlemen, this legislation is difficult. I am not going to tell this House that there are not going to be more claims. I believe there will be more claims.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. But in spite of the gentleman's misgivings, I understand the gentleman is for this bill?

Mr. BOX. I am, because I would rather make an honest effort to deal with a bad situation than to throw it down and run off and say that because there is some danger I will not have anything to do with it. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. I have so much confidence in the gentleman from Texas that I am going to vote with him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I believe in the general principles embodied in this legislation and want to support it and see it passed. I believe that in the interest of the bill generally the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina should be adopted.

This is a new proposition, but because it is new we ought not to turn it aside. We ought to take it up, but at the same time there is no reason at all why in taking it up we should not safeguard it against possible abuse. Why it is that on both sides of the aisle there are a large number of Members who are in favor of the general proposition? This was clearly stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box] a moment ago, when he said that it is a physical impossibility for the Committee on Claims to really handle the number of bills presented to it, and to handle them well and conscientiously.

The great majority of these claims, of course, run in amounts from a few dollars up to $5,000 or $10,000. Bills embodying claims in excess of $10,000 are in the great minority. If this is the case, by the passing of this legislation, limited in its effect to claims in small amounts, we are really accomplishing the major portion of our purpose. We are then leaving to the committee plenty of time to take care of the larger claims, above $25,000, and the committee is going to have ample opportunity and ample time to take care of such claims.

Then, after the law has been in effect for a period of years and we have had an opportunity to judge whether it is being abused by an excess of claims or whether the courts are too lenient in rendering judgments under the bill, then we can remove the limit if that is then necessary.

Therefore it seems to me that in order to properly start this bill out and remove some of the objections to it we ought to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina and limit these tort claims to $25,000.

I think the committee will not be overburdened by claims of above this figure.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. I will.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will ask the gentleman the same question I have asked others: How do you differentiate between contract claims, property claims, and admiralty claims that are limitless?

Mr. NEWTON. As far as contract claims are concerned they seem to me to stand on an entirely different basis. You have the Government and the citizen entering into contractual relations. There is something certain about what the damages will be. As to admiralty I do not know anything about admiralty law and I am not going to say anything about it, but I do say that when you open up the field of torts and destroy the custom of ages and make the sovereign subject to lawsuits for wrongful acts of its employees or for the negligence of its employees, then you are entering into a very wide field. I do not believe that we ought to say "No; the Government is not going to be responsible for the negligent acts or omissions of its servants or the wrongful acts of its servants," but I do not think we ought to say we are going to be responsible without limit. I hope the gentleman and other members of the committee will yield on this question and let us get started where we will not be opening up the door to possibly a large number of lawsuits against the Government. Anyone who has been in large cities knows the efforts made by the claims gatherer to get claims to bring action upon them. We are inviting that very practice here, and if it is necessary to do it let us limit the amount.

Mr. LUCE. In view of what was said about discarding the "custom of ages," I would comment on the antiquity of this doctrine.

Under the Roman law judicial attitude varied at different periods. In the latter part of the Middle Ages came revolt against tyranny. In this particular the cities and towns and people successfully opposed kings and nobles, with the result that up to about the sixteenth century, speaking broadly, it was the doctrine of most of the world that corporations, whether municipal or otherwise, including governments in their corporate capacity, might be held responsible in court for either their own acts or those of their agents.

Then this doctrine was upset. By whom? By the tyrants, the absolute monarchs who came to dominate Europe. With absolutism in England under the Tudors and as long as the Stuarts could prevail, and with absolutism under such monarchs as Louis XIV, there was established the opposite doctrine, enforced for the first time with general acceptance, that the king could do no wrong.

Gentlemen have declared that the doctrine now prevails generally. On the contrary, England and the United States are the only countries in the civilized world where it prevails. It has been overturned in Germany, it has been overturned in France, it has been overturned on all the Continent of Europe, and it is a strange thing, sir, that these two countries—England and the United States, democratic in the essence of their government—still persist in adhering to this doctrine of the absolute monarchist that the rest of the world has rejected.

Ah, but we do not wholly hold to it. I wish the gentleman from Virginia was still in the room that I might tell him, it was his Commonwealth that led the way only two years after the Declaration of Independence in a revolt against this doctrine.

Said Justice Bouldin in 1874:

It has been the cherished policy of Virginia to allow to her citizens and others the largest liberty of suit against herself; and there has never been a moment since before October, 1778, that all persons have not enjoyed this right by express statute.

Authority to this end has been placed in 17 State constitutions, authority for the legislature to permit the States to be sued in the courts.

The other day, without warning that this subject was to be taken up, relying on my memory, without refreshing it by reference to notes, I erred as to what had taken place in my own State. I beg the indulgence of the House that I may correct the impression then given. I find that the Massachusetts Legislature in 1879 gave the courts the power to consider cases in contract and that in 1887 it intended to give the courts power to handle cases in tort, for it used these words, "All claims against the Commonwealth whether at law or in equity."

There come times when the courts make decisions that laymen can not fathom. With all due regard for the highest court in my own Commonwealth, I express my deep regret that in this matter, in one of the very few instances in its record, it saw fit to declare that the legislature did not mean what it said.

The court held it was not to be conceived that the legislature meant what its words would commonly mean. It held that the plain, simple purport of the language of the Massachusetts Legislature was not to be accepted, but that the words were to be taken in a juridical sense. So, by judicial legislation, the purpose of the legislature has been overthrown.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] expostulated at the idea that a government might hold itself responsible for defects in highways or injuries caused by negligence of the servants of the State in connection with highways. In reply I may point out that my State has by specific legislation empowered the courts to handle cases growing out of defects in the State highways.

It was my province at one time to be at the head of the committee in our State legislature which would have handled these matters. My colleague [Mr. GIFFORD] served in the State senate, as I recall it, on the corresponding committee. Neither he nor I can remember any claim referred to those committees, save possibly in one instance in my own case, where there was more of equity than of law involved. We have turned these claims cases out of the legislature, and Massachusetts still survives. Her treasury has not been wrecked. Her people have not been wronged.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What was the object, then, of the statute passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts not later than 1924 conferring jurisdiction on the attorney general to consider claims up to a thousand dollars, and over $1,000 to investigate them and make recommendations to the legislature?

Mr. LUCE. By such legislation we have so reduced the number of claims that our general court is no longer disturbed by their volume or by their importance.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And by "general court" the gentleman means the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts?

Mr. LUCE. That is what I mean.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I asked the question so that these western fellows around here would understand what the gentleman is talking about. [Laughter.] The gentleman admits that when the bill was under consideration before he was incorrect in his statement as to what they do in Massachusetts. I have not had time to look up the procedure in England or in the continental countries of Europe.

The gentleman evidently disagrees with his colleague [Mr. UNDERHILL], and I think I know that the gentleman is wrong in regard to what is possible over in England. At least, the gentleman from Massachusetts now having the floor puts England in the same class with us and places the continental countries of Europe in a different class. I am wondering whether, in referring to the procedure in Germany and France and in other countries in continental Europe, the gentleman is any more correct now than he was the other day when the bill was under consideration when he told us to what extent you could go in the courts of Massachusetts.

Mr. LUCE. No fellow Member has done me a greater favor when I have been on my feet than has my friend from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] in expressing doubt, because in so doing he reminds me of what I came very nearly forgetting. It happens that Prof. Edward N. Borchard, of Yale, has printed in the issues of the Yale Law Journal in the course of the past two years a series of six remarkable articles on "Governmental responsibility in tort." These articles are scholarly in the extreme. The writer has ransacked history, has furnished a multitude of citations, and has shown himself a complete master of the subject. My statements of fact in relation to the earlier history of the matter and the present situation abroad are to be credited to Prof. Edward N. Borchard, of Yale. If his accuracy should be questioned, I believe he would find ample reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

There being no objection, the amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BULWINKLE) there were—ayes 38, noes 46.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BULWINKLE: Page 3, line 17, after the word "claim," strike out "exceed $5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "is in excess of $5,000 but does not exceed $50,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BULWINKLE) there were—ayes 41, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BULWINKLE: Page 3, line 16, after the word "of" in line 16, strike out "the Federal tort claims" and insert in lieu thereof the word "this."

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is introduced to clarify the unusual procedure of citing the act in the act creating the act. Under this a great many Members did not know what the Federal tort claims act was. That is the bill that we are now considering.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I bow to the superior judgment of my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. Paragraph 20 of section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, is amended by adding after the first subdivision thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"Concurrent with the Court of Claims, of all claims liability for which is recognized under Title I of the Federal tort claims act, if the amount claimed is in excess of $5,000 but does not exceed $10,000. All suits brought and tried under the provisions of this paragraph shall be tried by the court without a jury."

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: Page 3, beginning with line 18, strike out section 4, commencing with line 18, on page 3, and ending with line 2, on page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 4. Subsection 20. Section 24, Judicial Code, as amended (subsection 20, section 41, title 28, United States Code), is amended as follows:

"'(20) Suits against United States. Twentieth. Concurrent with the Court of Claims, of all claims not exceeding $10,000, founded upon the Constitution of the United States or any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, or for damages, liquidated or unliquidated, in cases not sounding in tort, in respect to which claims the party would be entitled to redress against the United States, either in a court of law, equity, or admiralty, if the United States were suable, and of all set-offs, counterclaims, claims for damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, or other demands whatsoever on the part of the Government of the United States against any claimant against the Government in said court; and of any suit or proceeding commenced after the passage of the revenue act of 1921, for the recovery of any internal-revenue tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, or of any penalty claimed to have been collected without authority or sum alleged to have been excessive or in any manner wrongfully collected under the internal revenue laws, even if the claim exceeds $10,000, if the collector of internal revenue by whom such tax, penalty, or sum was collected is dead or is not in office as collector of internal revenue at the time such suit or proceeding is commenced. Nothing in this paragraph shall be construed as giving to either the district courts or the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine claims growing out of the Civil War, and commonly known as "war claims," or to hear and determine other claims which had been rejected or reported on adversely prior to the 3d day of March, 1887, by any court, department, or commission authorized to hear and determine the same, or to hear and determine claims for pensions; or as giving to the district courts jurisdiction of cases brought to recover fees, salary, or compensation for official services of officers of the United States or brought for such purpose by persons claiming as such officers or as assignees or legal representatives thereof; but no suit pending on the 27th day of June, 1898, shall abate or be affected by this provision. No suit against the Government of the United States shall be allowed under this paragraph unless the same shall have been brought within six years after the right accrued for which the claim is made. The claims of married women, first accrued during marriage, of persons under the age of 21 years, first accrued during minority, and of idiots, lunatics, insane persons, and persons beyond the seas at the time the claim accrued, entitled to the claim, shall not be barred if the suit be brought within three years after the disability has ceased; but no other disability than those enumerated shall prevent any claim from being barred, nor shall any of the said disabilities operate cumulatively. Concurrent with the Court of Claims, of all claims liability for which is recognized under Title I of the Federal tort claims act, if the amount claimed is in excess of $5,000 but does not exceed $10,000. All suits brought and tried under the provisions of this paragraph shall be tried by the court without a jury.'"

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, as I followed the reading of the amendment, this is merely the quoting of the law as it now reads, instead of referring to it, in lines 18 and 19, on page 3. Am I right in reference to that?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, merely this: On page 3 of the bill, line 18, you will notice that it cites paragraph twentieth. It should be "paragraph 20 of section 24 thereof, a new section." Under this section of the Judicial Code there is only one section, and the amendment here proposed goes into what you might call the body of that section in making a new subdivision. But this just reenacts the provision of the Judicial Code affecting this section, plus the words beginning on line 22 of section 3.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And ending on page 4 in line 2?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes. While I am here I may state that through inadvertence I overlooked this just now, and probably we will have to have an amendment to this amendment striking out and inserting "Title I of the Federal tort claims act."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. The Clerk will report the amendment for information.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The latter part of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent with the Court of Claims of all claims liability for which is recognized under Title I of the Federal tort claims act if the amount claimed is in excess of $5,000 but does not exceed $10,000. All suits brought and tried under the provisions of this paragraph shall be tried by the court without a jury.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, if I caught correctly the gentleman's amendment it prohibits the bringing of any suit in the Federal court where the cause of action arose on a claim six years prior to bringing the suit?

Mr. BULWINKLE. No. If the gentleman will read, beginning on line 22, page 3, he will notice it gives concurrent jurisdiction between the court of the districts and the Court of Claims.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Something is stricken out here.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I know; but the gentleman is reading the original law as it is at present.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Then is the gentleman amending the present law?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; so as to get it in proper form. That is all.

Mr. HUDSPETH. It is such a long amendment——

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is true, but as I stated before, you have the words repeated there. That would be the case if this were added to the existing law.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I just caught the reading of the latter part. I was absent for a moment from the Chamber attending a hearing in the Committee on Appropriations. What is the gentleman seeking to do with the bill that we passed out of the committee, reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], as I understood, by unanimous vote? What are you seeking to amend here?

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is to clarify it. That is all.

Mr. HAWLEY. The first part of that amendment, as I understand it, is just a reenactment of existing law. We will have it all in one place.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; in one paragraph. The error in the bill was in referring to two subdivisions.

Mr. BULWINKLE. There was no subdivision.

Mr. HUDSPETH. It says:

Concurrent with the Court of Claims of all claims liability for which is recognized under Title I of the Federal tort claims act, if the amount claimed is in excess of $5,000 but does not exceed $10,000. All suits brought and tried under the provisions of this paragraph shall be tried by the court without a jury.

Now, if that is in the bill, why is the gentleman seeking again to reinsert it?

Mr. BULWINKLE. If that were left out, then you would have under section 41 of the act——

Mr. HUDSPETH. Are you speaking of the bill or of the present law?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I am talking about the bill as it will be if reenacted. There is only one subdivision of section 20 under the existing law. Then you have this:

All suits brought and tried under the provisions of this paragraph shall be tried by the court without a jury.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Where are you going to place the provision amending the bond?

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is incorporated right here in the existing law.

Mr. HUDSPETH. When you go to placing it in the code what are you going to do with it? You mean in the code that has just been enacted?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Either the judicial act or the code just enacted. It does not change existing law.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I understood the gentleman was limiting the suits that can be brought within six years from the time the cause of action arose up to the time the suit was instituted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman assures me it does not alter that situation.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The only thing I am doing here is to show the House what section of the Judicial Code is amended by this provision in the bill.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman is not injecting any new matter into the bill?

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is the same matter which is in the bill, commencing in line 22, on page 3, and ending in line 2, on page 4. It is the same matter in the bill placed as an amendment showing what the existing law is. That is all.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If that is what the gentleman intends, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. Suit under section 24 or 145 of the Judicial Code, as amended by this act, upon a claim accruing on or after April 6, 1920, and prior to the passage of this act, shall be brought within one year after the passage of this act or within six years after the accrual of the claim.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I move to strike out, in line 5, page 4, "1920," and insert in lieu thereof "1925."

In line 6, strike out the words "one year" and insert in lieu thereof the words "six months."

In line 7, strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERHILL: On page 4, in line 5, strike out the figures "1920" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1925."

In line 6, strike out the words "one year" and insert in lieu thereof the words "six months."

In line 7, strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

Mr. BOX. I want to ask the chairman if he does not understand that this insertion of 1925 has the effect of simply limiting the operation of this bill to causes of action arising after that date and that it has no effect at all on such causes of action which arose prior to 1925, such as my colleague from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] has in mind?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman is absolutely correct. We had to set a limit. This bill was drawn at least four or five years ago, and in redrawing the bill from year to year those dates were left in. It is perfectly apparent to the Members that it would not be wise to set such a long limit as is now contained in the bill. Consequently, we have suggested the change of date to 1925, and it does not act as a retroactive feature at all.

Mr. BOX. And leaves the holders of those claims with all the rights and advantages they now have?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does not the gentleman think to reduce the time from one year to six months after the passage of this act is an unnecessary limitation? Just why does the gentleman think one year after the passage of this act is too long?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I frankly stated to the House on a previous occasion that I had accepted this suggestion as strengthening the bill in another body, and that the reason for it was a reason which appealed strongly to me, and that was that in these Government suits it would be well to reduce the time as far as was possible to do so in order to protect the Government against suits which might be brought and the witnesses might have disappeared in the meantime. It is a protective measure for the Government.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Three months would be still more protective, but that is not the question. It is a question of reasonableness.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think six months is long enough. If a fellow has a suit to bring against the Government or anyone else, he ought to bring it within a short time. In the original bill the limitation was 60 days. That was increased to one year later on in order to conform to the general practice in the courts. However, it was thought very unwise to leave it one year, but that we should reduce it to six months, which is considered a reasonable time.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not want to oppose the committee's action, but I simply want to state that one year would not be an unreasonable time after the enactment of the law. A lot of people do not learn what Congress does even within that length of time. Even some Members of Congress a year after a law is passed wake up to a realization that they did not know such a law ever passed.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It will take care of most cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

SEC. 7. No suit upon any claim shall be brought under section 4 or 5 if the claim has been determined by the head of any department or establishment under section 1; and no claim shall be presented for consideration to the head of any department or establishment under section 1 if final judgment thereon has been rendered in a suit upon such claim brought under section 4 or 5.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NEWTON: On page 4, line 13, strike out lines 13, 14, and 15 to and including the semicolon.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, the committee will note that I have stricken out the language which constitutes words of limitation; that is, "no suit upon any claim shall be brought under section 4 or 5 if the claim has been determined by the head of any department or establishment under section 1."

Under the plan or scheme provided in the bill you can take a claim and go to the department and have it determined there. If the claim is over $5,000, you then have recourse to the courts. This provision makes a determination—now mark this—this provision makes a determination by a department head absolute and final.

If there is anything I do not like and that the average Member of Congress does not like it is the granting of arbitrary power to anyone, and this applies to any member of the executive branch of the government. I abhor the exercise of arbitrary power by anyone.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. As I understand, it is the gentleman's contention that under the bill the language makes the finding of a department head final.

Mr. NEWTON. Exactly.

Mr. HUDSPETH. And you have no right to go into court.

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. NEWTON. You have no recourse.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman is absolutely mistaken.

Mr. NEWTON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], if there is any question about it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I had understood just the reverse, I will state to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I stand firm for the right of the citizen to have his day in court, but I do not declare for a policy of giving him three or four chances at it. This paragraph determines that if the department head decides against him he can not carry it to court; and it also determines that if the court decides against him he can not carry it to the department; but it does not prevent him from coming to Congress at any time he wants to.

Mr. NEWTON. He has that right to-day. The citizen can come to Congress, but, as I said a few moments ago, under a rule which has been established by the gentleman's committee, if a department head says that a tort claim is not just, under the rule of the gentleman's committee a Member of Congress is precluded now from having the committee pass judgment upon it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. There is no such rule in the committee, and there has never been such a rule in the committee. If the gentleman must force me to a confession, I will say that I have exercised arbitrary powers in the committee which I had no right to exercise and from which I want to be relieved. I adopted this procedure in order that we might get action on some matters and do some justices rather than take up a case that has not a snowball's chance either in the committee or on the floor of the House and spend weeks on that case to the exclusion of a score or more cases with real merit. This is in the interest of most of my colleagues, and if there is anybody to blame I will accept the responsibility.

Mr. NEWTON. I am not seeking to place the blame upon anybody. I am stating a fact.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. In just a moment. What I am seeking to do is to get away from the present situation that we are in.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And let us get through it by this bill.

Mr. NEWTON. We want to get through it in the right way, and the way the bill is now drawn you can not get through it because if it is a small claim you can not get into court. If it is a small claim, you can get the department head to pass upon it up to $5,000; but if the department head rules against it, you are foreclosed now, under the gentleman's idea of the way the procedure should be conducted in his committee, and we will be foreclosed if we pass this bill. This takes in a great majority of the claimants. Wherein are we benefiting ourselves by any such legislation if we so restrict it?

I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is not this the scope of the bill, and I would like to have also the attention of the chairman of the committee? Under subdivision (b) on page 2, authority is conferred upon department heads to settle and adjust claims up to $5,000.

Mr. NEWTON. That is right.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Now, nowhere else is there any jurisdiction conferred upon a department head except under that subdivision.

Mr. NEWTON. That is correct.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Then we come to page 3, and under section 3 jurisdiction is conferred upon the courts to consider claims in excess of $5,000, and no jurisdiction is conferred upon the court except in respect of claims in excess of $5,000.

Mr. NEWTON. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Then we come to page 4, and under this provision which the gentleman proposes to strike out, the conclusion or decision of a department head as to a claim of less than $5,000 is made conclusive and final.

Mr. NEWTON. That is right.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Now, if we are going to make the bill so that the department shall have final and exclusive jurisdiction, would not we have to go back to section 3 and strike out the words in lines 16 and 17, "If the amount of the claim exceeds $5,000"—and this would confer jurisdiction on the court in all claims?

Mr. NEWTON. That is correct.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Would it not be an advantage to give the claimant the choice or opportunity if he is poor and has a small claim to go to the department head first, which would be accomplished by the second amendment, the one the gentleman has suggested, and the one I have outlined on page 3, and enable him to present his claim to the department, and then the department represents the Government as if the district attorney is conferring with a criminal or the counsel of a city is conferring with a man who has a claim against the city—the situation is precisely the same.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The man should not be bound by the determination of the officer who represents the other side, but should have his day in court. The man with a small claim can not have his day in court except by the two amendments.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Ninety per cent of these claims will be claims of poor, practically helpless people ranging in amount from $1,000 to $5,000. By passing the bill as drawn without the two amendments you are not affording any relief to this large number of claimants, but only relief to the big fellow who has a claim beyond the $5,000, reaching up in amount however great it may be; is not that the truth?

Mr. NEWTON. That is correct.

Mr. DEMPSEY. So that we are extending relief to the man who does not need it, and giving such limited relief to the poor man that, according to my experience and the experience of all of us, is no relief at all.

Mr. NEWTON. Yes; the claimant under these conditions, if he knows about the law and the officers who handle the claims, would base his claim on a sum over $5,000 in order to get into the court. That is what we are inviting.

Mr. DEMPSEY. We are not criticizing the Government, but we say it is a prejudiced judgment and would inevitably be a prejudiced judgment, and the claimant ought not to be bound by a judgment of that kind.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My experience induces me to agree with the gentleman from Minnesota. When I first came to the House I was on the Committee on Claims, and I know how the departments acted then, and I know how the departments act recently. I knew about a claim that would not take a jury 15 minutes to decide, but which an officer of the department promptly rejected on the statement of a colored driver of an Army truck. That claimant would be entirely remediless if his claim was left at $5,000.

Mr. NEWTON. He would, save for the somewhat theoretical remedy which he now has to come to Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. NEWTON. In view of the interruptions, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. I will.

Mr. BOX. I want to call attention to the language "claims up to $5,000." There is no such thing as appealing from one of these cases tried by the department under this act, because this act places the jurisdiction of the court above that sum. Would the gentleman have an overlapping there?

Mr. NEWTON. Yes; I am glad the gentleman has asked the question. We know what it is to present a claim to the department. For example, they have a report of the post-office inspector on the alleged negligence or conduct of the post-office truck driver. The evidence that comes before the departmental officer is in some instances meager. There is no opportunity for cross-examination. They rely in a large measure on the judgment of the post-office inspector. It is not like a lawsuit; it is not handled like a lawsuit. After you have presented a claim of that kind the law officer says, "No; you are not entitled to it."

I do not see any reason at all why a claimant should then be barred from proceeding in the courts. I can see why, by electing to go into the courts, the departments should then be barred from handling it, because you have then determined the question judicially in a judicial procedure, with the opportunity to have witnesses and to examine and cross-examine; but I can not figure out why a man who feels he has a just claim against the Government should be precluded from going into court if his claim has been before a departmental officer.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Is there any reason why he could not go into court without going to a department?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; because under this bill as it is now drawn, if the claim is under $5,000, he is precluded from going to the courts.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I understand that, but in damage suits of this character is there any reason why a lawyer can not bring suit for $10,000, as they generally do?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I just stated to the gentleman from New York that if we did not do this we will be writing an invitation to increase the amount and to bring the action.

Once more, I want to emphasize the fact that because of the unfortunate and unhappy experience of one or two or three of our Members in going before departments and having their claims turned down, we ought not therefore to amend this bill. The purpose of this bill is to give everybody a chance. We can not cover every remote contingency. I can imagine several things that might come up under this bill if my imagination were elastic enough, that would ruin the bill. What we are trying to do is to do justice and equity to the greatest number. We provide the departmental service for those who can not afford the courts, and we provide courts for those who have larger claims and who can afford the courts. There is no reason in the world why a man who has been before a court and has been refused judgment should then be allowed to come before a department for a smaller sum with the expectation that he might touch their hearts and get something. We have been all through this. We gave plenty of time to the discussion of it. It is just a repetition of what we went through before, and it was defeated overwhelmingly when it came to a vote.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. This provision that is sought to be stricken out by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON], the first clause of section 7, which prevents the claimant from going to court after he has been to the department, but does it prevent a claimant from coming to Congress?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No. He can not go to court now. One would think to hear some of these people talk that every claimant there is in the United States has an opportunity now to go to the courts, whereas no mother's son can go to court now. We are providing here so that scores or hundreds may go to the courts, and relieve the Congress, and then perhaps Congress might have some time to take up some of these disputed questions with the department.

Mr. NEWTON. I judge from the gentleman's remarks that he has the idea that my amendment would permit a claimant after having gone to the courts to then go to the departments. My amendment does not affect that provision at all.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I know that.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. This language seems to contemplate stopping people from bringing suit upon claims which have been passed on by the departments, where they are given exclusive jurisdiction under subsection (b) of section 1.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is the word "exclusively" still in there?

Mr. UNDERHILL. It is not in there.

Mr. STEVENSON. You have struck that out?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BOX. Suppose the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] is agreed to, under this act, will a man who has a claim for $5,000 or less then have a right to go into court?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; positively no. He has no more right than he has now.

Mr. NEWTON. But by returning to section 3 and passing the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York, he would have that right.

Mr. UNDERHILL. But we are not going to return.

Mr. NEWTON. Of course, the gentleman can prevent our returning, but I want to adopt a measure that will meet some of the problems that Members have. I am not merely trying to get through a bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And neither am I.

Mr. NEWTON. The bill as it is now drawn does not meet our situation.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Gentlemen, I am not trying merely to get through this bill. It does not matter to me whether the bill passes or not. I do not believe there is a Member in Congress, however, that it will not affect sooner or later. One of our Members who never had a claim before this committee and never expected to have a claim all at once had to come before the committee with a claim that involved over 2,000 of his constituents only within a year. You do not know what the Government's activities are going to bring about, and if you let the present situation go on as it is the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX] and the gentleman from Massachusetts will not have a chance before Congress to get their claims even printed. We will have to run overtime to print them.

Mr. NEWTON. As far as the gentleman from Minnesota is concerned, he has no chance now.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I crave the indulgence of the House. Much has been said here about the manner in which claims get consideration or fail to get consideration after they have been adversely reported on by the departments.

The chairman has within the hearing of the House said that he takes some responsibility for some arbitrary action. He is probably not quite fair to himself in saying that. I want to say to the Members of the House that I can from my place now cite a great many claims, or at least several that come at once to my mind, where the departments have made adverse reports, where they were referred to the subcommittee of which I am a member, reported favorably, and passed by this House.

Mr. NEWTON. If the gentleman has any influence on his committee, will he kindly have some of my bills referred to his subcommittee? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOX. I fear I am inviting too much work.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If that will be done without the passage of this bill, we do not want to stop the good work.

Mr. BOX. Whatever mistakes we may make, I am quite sure that it is not the rule of the committee to consider the finding of a department as final. I myself, with the support of my colleagues on both sides of the table, and with the support of the chairman of this committee, have caused a number of those departmental reports to be overruled and the bills have been ordered paid by this House.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is not the gentleman's argument the strongest kind of an argument for passing the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota? What the gentleman from Texas says is true, that his experience with the department is just what you would expect; that they as a rule determine in favor of the Government, just as you would naturally expect them to do. Now, in all these cases where you say the department has ruled one way and your committee has found that the ruling, justly and fairly and equitably and properly, should be the other way, the poor claimant, if this bill is passed, will have no remedy at all unless you adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota, and say that after the claim has been rejected by the department the claimant can still go to court.

Mr. BOX. With all respect to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON], both able gentlemen, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota does not touch the question he is aiming at.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Why not?

Mr. BOX. If the gentleman will hear me, I think he will see the reason when I state it. The department under this act settles claims under $5,000.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Wait a minute. When I questioned the gentleman from Minnesota I suggested that we go back to page 3 and strike out, in lines 16 and 17, the words "if the amount exceeds $5,000."

Mr. BOX. If it is proposed to put that in by another amendment, it may accomplish the purpose he has in mind; but by itself it will not avail.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The two things have to coincide, and we expect the committee will make the two things coincide.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BOX. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas, does the committee always follow the reports of the departments?

Mr. BOX. I do not always follow the departments for they make mistakes both ways.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Do you follow the department's recommendations where they are favorable?

Mr. BOX. Not in every case, notwithstanding the statement of the chairman, which he makes courageously here. I believe that most members of that committee believe—and there are other gentlemen here who have served on it before—that if a claim comes in with an adverse departmental report and we think it is wrong, it is our duty to do what is right, and we try to do it. If the department recommends an amount that we think ought not to be paid, we do not do it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. There is a question I want to ask with reference to the gentleman's statement. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. You say that under the present practice when a claim comes in you send it to the department for its recommendation and then when it comes back to the committee you investigate the correctness of their determination. But under this bill you send it down to the department and it makes its determination finally. You do not reserve the right to rectify mistakes or errors of decisions based upon facts which the department puts forth representing the Government.

Mr. BOX. We retain every right that Congress now has.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If it is sent to a department for full investigation and determination, that determination will be final, and you could do nothing.

Mr. BOX. Well, that would be that much relief granted. The remedy is not perfect. But you would have all you have now and more.

Mr. DEMPSEY. You can still go to court?

Mr. BOX. You can go to court.

Mr. DEMPSEY. This opportunity for obtaining relief should be given to the small claimant as well as to the large claimant.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I have a bill for the relief of three men who are employed in the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department has reported favorably upon that bill, and although nothing contrary to that recommendation has been presented to the committee, the committee has never reported out my bill for the relief of those three men.

Mr. BOX. Has the gentleman ever been before the subcommittee or appealed to the chairman for a hearing?

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. The chairman of the committee [Mr. UNDERHILL] is sitting at the desk and is listening to me. He knows that I have badgered and plagued him for a report, but he is hard-boiled. I do not know why he has not given the relief that I have sought and prayed for without success. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOX. I want to say a word about the work of that committee. The chairman and I are friends, and we try to be coworkers for the Government. Sometimes we put a little different construction on the rules of the committee. I believe that under the rules of the committee when a member requests in writing the reference of a claim to a subcommittee he has a right to have it referred. Sometimes when a man gets an adverse report from the department that ends it with the chairman. Am I right, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. UNDERHILL. If the gentleman will realize that the number of members of the committee is limited, he will understand that if all these requests for reference were granted we would not know how to take care of them.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS].

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, this bill gives authority to the head of each department to settle claims under $5,000, and according to this bill that is a bar to any suit. What is there in this bill to prohibit the head of any department, after any claim has arisen in that department, from deciding it ex parte?

Mr. BOX. It is on the judgment and responsibility of the branch of the Government that is helping to carry on the Government. They may be wrong sometimes, but there are not many up there, I think, who would just say, "Here is a fellow with a claim and we will just cut him off with no chance to present his facts." There are very few such men in the departments.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I do not mean to say that men of that character would go that far, but men are prone to believe their own witnesses or those in their own departments, and that might bar a man who had a just claim from having his proofs properly presented.

Mr. BOX. You mean in court?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. No; I mean before the head of a department.

Mr. BOX. The department would be the judge of the sufficiency of the evidence and of the measure of justice which it administers, and then they can come back to the Committee on Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It has been stated that Congress retains jurisdiction. Suppose a claim has not been allowed and it comes back to the House for action, what then will be the procedure? Would it not then be referred to another committee and the party have two days in court or another day in court?

Mr. BOX. If it is a claim which the Speaker would refer to the Claims Committee it will go to the Claims Committee and receive such consideration as they think it ought to have. I have stated two or three times, and I do not think I am in error about it, that ordinarily where a department has gone over it and made an ascertainment about it that that will create a stronger feeling on the part of the committee that the department has probably settled it and settled it right.

Mr. O'BRIEN. In other words, it would give the party two days in court?

Mr. BOX. He would have two days.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to see whether or not the gentleman from east Texas and the gentleman from west Texas understand this bill the same. Under the present law department heads are permitted—and I would like the gentleman from New York to follow me in this—to settle claims up to $1,000.

Mr. BOX. I think that is right.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If this bill is passed, as I understand it, it will permit department heads to settle claims up to $5,000?

Mr. BOX. That is right.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Is not that the only change made in the law?

Mr. BOX. As to amount and jurisdiction; yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If I understand the idea of the gentleman from New York he desires to confer jurisdiction upon the court, and if that is so he should offer an amendment providing that the court shall have jurisdiction of claims from $1,000 to $10,000. That is the way I follow the gentleman, and I would support this kind of amendment. I want just claims to have a day in court.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the gentleman will yield, it is suggested, if the present amendment prevails, that then leave will be asked to return to page 3 and strike out the words in lines 16 and 17:

If the amount claimed exceeds $5,000.

Which would give the court jurisdiction of all claims of the nature covered by this bill.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The Federal courts now have jurisdiction of suits where the amount is greater than $3,000.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Arising out of contract.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes. Of course, as to cases in tort it would be a different proposition.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think there is this difference in the law also: I do not think the present jurisdiction of $1,000 claims is exclusive. If a man who has submitted his claim in that way has accepted his remedy, of course, he has no resort to the court; but it will put him in a different attitude if we pass this bill and a great deal worse attitude toward Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NEWTON) there were—ayes 24, noes 39.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] asks unanimous consent to return to section 5 for the purpose of offering an amendment giving the United States Code citation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: On page 4, line 4, after the word "Code," insert "(United States Code, Title 28, secs. 41 and 250.)"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. (a) The provisions of this title shall not apply to—

(1) Any claim arising out of the loss or miscarriage or negligent transmission of letters or postal matter.

(2) Any claim arising in respect of the assessment or collection of any tax or customs duty.

(3) Any claim for which liability of the Government is recognized by the act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. 389), relating to loss or destruction of or damage to personal property and effects of officers and enlisted men and others in the naval service or the Coast Guard; by the act of March 3, 1885 (23 Stat. 350), as amended, relating to loss, damage, or destruction in the military service of private property belonging to officers, enlisted men, and members of the Nurse Corps (female) of the Army; or by the act of March 9, 1920 (41 Stat. 525), or the act of March 3, 1925 (43 Stat. 1112), relating to claims against merchant and public vessels of the United States or of corporations the entire stock of which is owned by the United States.

(4) Any claim arising out of the conveyance, transfer, assignment, or delivery of money or other property or out of the payment to or seizure by the President or Alien Property Custodian of any money or other property in administering the provisions of the trading with the enemy act, as amended.

(5) Any claim arising out of the administration of the quarantine law.

(b) The act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of claims arising against the Government of the United States in sums not exceeding $1,000 in any one case," approved December 28, 1922, is hereby repealed, except that any claim accruing prior to such repeal may be considered, ascertained, adjusted, determined, and certified in the same manner and to the same extent as if this act were not law.

(c) The provisions of any act, in so far as inconsistent with the provisions of this title, are hereby repealed to the extent of such inconsistency.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: On page 5 strike out subsection 3, lines 1 to 15, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "(3) Any claim for which settlement is provided by the act of October 6, 1917 (secs. 981–982, inclusive, title 34, United States Code), relating to the loss, damage, or destruction of the property of officers and enlisted men in the naval service, in the Marine Corps, and in the Coast Guard; by the act of March 3, 1885 (secs. 218–222, inclusive, title 31, United States Code), as amended, relating to the loss, damage, or destruction of the property of officers, enlisted men, and members of the Nurse Corps (female) of the Army; or by the act of March 9, 1920 (secs. 741–752, inclusive, title 46, United States Code); or the act of March 3, 1925 (secs. 781–790, inclusive, title 46, United States Code), relating to claims or suits in admiralty against the United States."

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, there are two purposes to be served by this amendment, first to give the citation to the United States Code and, second, to change the wording of the section in the bill somewhat.

The members of the committee will notice, in line 1, on page 5, the language is "any claim for which liability of the Government is recognized." I do not think this is a good expression to use, and the statement in the amendment is "any claim for which settlement is provided" by the various acts, and so forth. I think this clarifies the language, in this particular as well as in some others.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think also, Mr. Chairman, that is an improvement.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERHILL: On page 6, in line 6, strike out the period, add a comma, and the following: "And nothing contained in the exceptions in section 8 of this act shall be considered as precluding the Congress from considering claims for injuries or damages arising under said exceptions."

Mr. UNDERHILL. This is merely to clarify the situation, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment: On page 6, line 2, after the figures "1922," insert "(United States Code, title 31, secs. 215 to 217)."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: On page 6, line 2, after the figures "1922," insert "(United States Code, title 31, secs. 215 to 217)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE II.—PERSONAL INJURY AND DEATH CLAIMS

SEC. 201. (a) Subject to the limitations of this act the Government of the United States authorizes the payment of claims on account of personal injury or death, if the claim accrued after April 6, 1920, and if the injury or death was either (1) caused by the negligence or wrongful act or omission of any officer or employee of the Government acting within the scope of his office or employment, or (2) attributable to any defect or insufficiency in any machinery, vehicle, appliance, or other materials and such defect or insufficiency was due to the negligence or wrongful omission of an officer or employee of the Government.

(b) No compensation shall be allowed for any such injury or death if the injury or death results from the fact that the person injured or the decedent was intoxicated or under the influence of drugs, or if the injury or death is caused by the willful misconduct of the person injured or the deceased, or by the intention of the person injured or the deceased to bring about injury or death to himself or another. Contributory negligence shall operate to diminish the damages recoverable in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the person injured or to the deceased.

(c) No compensation shall be allowed for any such injury or death to the extent that the injury is continued or aggravated, or that the death is caused by an unreasonable refusal or negligent failure to submit to or procure medical or surgical treatment, the risk of which is, in the judgment of the United States Employees' Compensation Commission (hereinafter referred to as the commission), based upon expert medical or surgical advice, inconsiderable in view of the seriousness of the injury.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the usual amendment, changing the date from 1920 to 1925.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERHILL: Page 6, line 14, strike out the figures "1920" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1925."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 202. (a) Exclusive authority is hereby conferred upon the commission, acting on behalf of the Government, to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine any claim liability for which is recognized under section 201, if the amount of the claim does not exceed $7,500. Such amount as may be found to be due to any claimant shall be certified to the Congress as a just claim for payment out of appropriations that may be made by Congress therefor, together with a brief statement of the character of each claim, the amount claimed, and the amount allowed: Provided, That no claim shall be considered by the commission unless filed within six months after the injury or one year after death caused by the injury, except that for reasonable cause shown the commission may allow claims for compensation for such injury to be filed any time within one year after the injury, and except that any claim accrued after April 6, 1920, but prior to the passage of this act, may be filed within one year after the passage of this act.

(b) Acceptance by any claimant of the amount determined under this title shall be deemed to be in full settlement of the claim against the Government of the United States and the officer or employee.

(c) The commission shall by regulation provide for the form and manner in which claims under this title shall be presented before the commission.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERHILL: On page 8, in line 6, strike out the figures "1920" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1925."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOX: On page 7, line 25, after the word "allowed," strike out the colon and insert the words "with a summary of the evidence upon which the allowance was made."

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, this simply makes the clause that deals with settlements made by the Compensation Commission subject to the same regulations that govern a department; that is, when they submit their report they must submit a summary of the evidence upon which they acted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 204. (a) The compensation for personal injury shall be paid to the injured individual, except that if the individual dies before compensation has been paid, the compensation shall be allowed and paid as in the case of compensation for death.

(b) Compensation for death shall be allowed and paid as follows:

(1) Compensation shall be allowed only for death caused by injury and occurring within three years after the injury; except that no compensation shall be awarded where the death takes place more than one year after the cessation of disability resulting from such injury, or (in the absence of any such disability preceding death) more than one year after the injury.

(2) The compensation shall be allowed and paid to the following beneficiaries:

(A) To the widow or widower, or if there is no widow or widower, then to the children, share and share alike. Compensation to a child shall not be allowed unless the child is unmarried and is either under 18 years of age or, having reached the age of 18, is physically or mentally incapable of self-support. Compensation for a child under 18 years of age shall be paid to the legal guardian.

(B) To any parent or grandparent who was totally or partially dependent for support upon the deceased at the time of his death, having due regard for the extent of the dependency in cases of partial dependency under this paragraph.

(3) The total compensation which may be allowed on account of any one injury, or injury and death caused thereby, shall not exceed $7,500.

(4) The right of a beneficiary to compensation for death shall not survive the death of such beneficiary.

(c) In addition to the money compensation provided under this title—

(1) In the case of personal injury, the injured individual shall be allowed such expenses for any medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies (including artificial members and other prosthetic appliances) as the commission adjudges necessary and reasonable for care of or relief from the results of an injury, subject to such regulations as the commission may prescribe with respect to the procurement of such services and supplies.

(2) In the case of death, the personal representatives of the decedent shall be allowed such funeral and burial expenses of the decedent as the commission adjudges to be necessary and reasonable, in an amount not to exceed $200.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. On page 9 provision is made for the payment of compensation to a child under 18 years of age or to his legal guardian. In some instances the compensation might be in an amount so small that the expense of having issued letters of guardianship might work a hardship, and I suggest to the chairman the possibility of providing that if the amount is under $500 the money may be paid to the parent or to one standing in place of the parent. What would be the objection to that?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I can not see any particular objection, except that all of this was taken verbatim from the compensation act that governs Federal employees. And I would prefer to leave it as it is.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have known cases where the amount to be paid was so small that the expense of procuring letters of guardianship worked a hardship on the person who was to be benefited.

Mr. UNDERHILL. But those cases are very small in number.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. HARE. On page 10, section 3, the total compensation which may be allowed in a case of injury is $7,500. Suppose in the case of the death of a husband it was found to be due to the negligence of some officer or agent of the Government. Do I understand that the extent of liability would be $7,500?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes. That is an increase of $2,500 over anything that is allowed heretofore in the last five years. The practice up to that time was to allow $2,000 or $3,000.

Mr. HARE. Does that take precedence over the provision that would enable the widow to go into court and ask for payment of the claim?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The widow can not go into court now.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I move to strike out the last word. Did the gentleman's committee consider the question of flood control and damages caused thereby?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The committee did not, but the chairman of the committee went into that very extensively, and on the best advice he could get found that there is no question that suits could not be brought under this bill.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. What provision in the bill prevents it?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No provision in the bill.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. It is damage to property. In the construction of a levee by an engineer of the Government suppose there was a faulty levee constructed—and there was negligence or some wrongful omission on the part of the engineers of the Government in constructing the levee which should happen to break and overflow the lands of a large part of the country. Would not a case of that sort come under this bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have advice that it would not.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I would like to know why it would not come under this bill. It would be negligence on the part of the agents and employees of the Government, and the bill specifically provides that the Government shall be liable for damages resulting from the negligence of its officers, agents, or employees.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will ask the gentleman if he considers that a matter of tort.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Certainly. It is damage to property, and it would come under the first title of the bill treating of damage to property and damage to property is a tort, as well as injury to the person.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I can not say of my own knowledge. I simply say that I have considered the matter and have consulted with several in reference to it, and they assured me that flood damage would not come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. It seems to me that it clearly comes under the first title. I would like to have the chairman of the committee or some member of the committee offer an amendment to make that clear, because the chairman of the committee says it was not the intention of the committee that flood-control suits should be brought under this act. I would suggest that at the end of Title I, where cases in which the Government shall not be liable are stated, you add a new section and say something like this—this bill shall not be applicable to cases arising out of the activity of the Government, its agents, or employees relating to flood control.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think I can answer the question of the gentleman from Virginia. I do not understand ordinarily—of course, a case might arise—but ordinarily there is no duty that devolves on the Government to build a levee. If the Government builds a levee, or provides by law for the building of a levee, and it is not sufficient, it would be no cause of action whatever for the party who suffered damage.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Suppose there is negligence on the part of the engineers of the Government, would not that come under this title?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not unless there is a duty on the part of the Government to build the levee in the first instance.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. But the law provides for that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, no; the law provides that a levee shall be constructed. The Government does that voluntarily.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I do not see it that way.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I would say to the gentleman that if it is his belief, and that belief is generally accepted by the Members, I would be very glad, indeed, to have him offer an amendment covering that feature, and consider it at the end of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I suggest to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] that a naked amendment of that sort would not reach the cases that are in the mind of my colleague from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD]. Those cases are not to be confined to the construction of levees, but include all river and harbor work; and if the agents of the Government, any or all of them, in conducting river and harbor work should by negligence or otherwise fail to do the proper thing and cause injury to private property, then under this bill unquestionably there would be liability, and I do not think there can be any doubt that a court would so hold.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Then I would change my suggestion and include the three gentlemen from Virginia—the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. MOORE, and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. WHITEHEAD, and also the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. MONTAGUE. I suggest that the three of them get together and formulate such an amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Let us suppose that a government builds a levee. The levee is built to protect certain lands. Then if that levee is insufficient, I do not see how the government is liable.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But the bill provides that when damage is caused by the Government or any agent of the Government there shall be liability. It does not undertake to say how the agent shall be appointed. He is the agent of the Government, and here is a bill explicitly providing that if the agent of the Government does something from which damage results, the Government can be sued and recovery can be had.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I fear that I have not paid sufficient attention to the particular form of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. My friend is such an able lawyer and has had so much judicial experience that I would be perfectly willing to leave to him the interpretation of the language to which my colleague from Virginia has referred.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As the gentleman states the language of the bill, to which my attention had not been called particularly, I am inclined to think that very likely there is something that should be guarded against.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. This bill would place the Government in the situation of an individual, and we all know that if an individual builds a dam across a river and backs up water, and that water injures the property of the riparian owners, he is liable for damages, or if the dam breaks by reason of negligence of the owner and overflows land below, then the owner of the dam or the man who built it is liable.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am very glad that my attention has been called to that. I think we better do that.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 205. As used in this title—

(a) The term "child" means (1) a legitimate child, (2) a child legally adopted prior to the death of the deceased, (3) a stepchild, if a member of the deceased's household at the time of his death, (4) a posthumous child, and (5) an illegitimate child, but as to the father only, if acknowledged in writing by him, or if he has been judicially ordered or decreed to contribute to such child's support or has been judicially decreed to be the putative father of such child.

(b) The term "widow" means the deceased's wife living with or dependent for support upon him at the time of his death, or living apart from him at such time because of his desertion.

(c) The term "widower" means the deceased's husband, but only if dependent in whole or in part for support upon the deceased at the time of her death.

(d) The term "parent" means a father, mother, father or mother through adoption, stepfather, stepmother, and persons who have stood in loco parentis to the deceased for a period of not less than two years just prior to his death.

(e) The term "grandparent" means a grandfather or grandmother.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: Page 11, subdivision (c), strike out lines 10, 11, and 12 and substitute the following: "(c) The term 'widower' means the deceased's husband living with her at the time of her death."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the necessity for securing legislation of some kind to reimburse those who are to be provided for in this bill is so great I propose to vote for this measure rather than postpone the day of getting relief in these cases, although I want to say there are certain provisions in the bill which do not have my approval.

We are conferring a judicial power upon the Compensation Commission, as it differs from the workmen's compensation act in this, that under the workmen's compensation act compensation is granted to any employee who is injured in the performance of his duty, and very little is left to the commission except the determination of the nature and extent of the injury.

The amendment I offer provides that the term "widower" means the deceased's husband living with her at the time of her death.

Under the wording of subdivision (c) a husband can not recover unless it could be shown he was financially dependent upon his wife.

By the death of a wife the husband suffers not only the loss of companionship but very grievous financial loss. It might be necessary for him to employ some one to take care of his home, or to place his children with some relative or in some boarding school or home at a very considerable expense, and to deprive him of recovery under such circumstances simply because he was not financially dependent for support upon his wife would be a very great injustice.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERHILL) there were—ayes 10, noes 30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee what provision is made for an illegitimate child where the father has not been determined by a judicial inquiry?

Mr. UNDERHILL. This whole matter pertaining to these claims is taken verbatim from the Federal workmen's compensation act. I did not feel justified in changing the provisions of that act or placing the citizens in a different class from the employees of the Government.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that an illegitimate child of a woman who has been injured as a result of negligence on the part of the Government stands in a more deserving position, from the standpoint of equity, than the employee of the Government?

Mr. UNDERHILL. It might be, but I did not feel that I was the one to adjudicate that question when it had been gone over by those who are wiser than I.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I would like to have an opportunity to offer an amendment under this section, Mr. Chairman. I have not the amendment written out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I have not written it out. It is in line 5, of page 11, after the word "child," to amend by inserting the words "Provided, That an illegitimate child, whose father has not been judicially determined by a competent court, shall have the same rights as a legitimate child under this act." I may ask leave to change the exact wording a little later on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania: Page 11, line 5, after the word "child," insert "Provided, That an illegitimate child whose father has not been determined by a competent court shall have the same rights as a legitimate child under this act."

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I offer this amendment for this reason: The illegitimate child has a definite status under the laws of most of the States of the Union. Under the laws of many of the States an illegitimate child whose father has not been determined by a competent court and his right of support fixed by such court inherits from the mother. Unless this bill is amended in such a way as has been proposed, if the mother of an illegitimate child is killed as the result of negligence on the part of the Government of the United States and that child's father has not been determined by a competent court, that illegitimate child, notwithstanding the fact that the death of the mother has resulted from the negligence of the United States Government, has no redress.

I ask Members of the House if that is a fair method of dealing with a child whose rights and chances are hard enough anyhow?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the bill should pass as it stands and there were a failure to adopt the gentleman's amendment, the provision would be at variance with the laws in effect in all the States?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does the gentleman's amendment cover children who are the issue of a common-law marriage? A common-law marriage in my State is recognized.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. It is so in Pennsylvania, my State. In such a case no question would arise in my State.

For many years I have had occasion to deal with illegitimates in the great city of Philadelphia, and the hardship is plain. I think if you could see this question in all its fullness you would say that this is only common justice and equity. I do not think the Members of the House will want to withhold fair play to an illegitimate child who is born into the world without any fault of its own and whose lot in life is hard enough anyhow. I do not care whether the law with reference to the Federal compensation is in accordance with this amendment or not. We are here to do justice as we see it under the circumstances, and, gentlemen of the House, I hope you will pass this amendment. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the following title:

H. R. 8216. An act to confer authority on the United States District Court for the Western District of Virginia to permit J. L. Sink, a bankrupt, to file his application for discharge and to authorize and empower the judge of said court to hear and determine the same.

The committee resumed its session.

GENERAL CLAIMS BILL

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, as I have said before several times, the bill is not intended to cover every individual case or remote cases of imagination which might be conjured up. It is supposed to be general in its character. The phraseology of this section of the bill is taken literally, verbatim, word for word, and punctuatam from the regular Federal compensation law. I do not think I am justified in passing judgment upon the wisdom of that law or attempting to amend it and give to the general citizenship of the country a status different from that given to any other class; that is, Federal employees. We might possibly be touched in our hearts and feel a great sympathy with the amendment offered by the gentleman, but I think it would be very unwise to change the compensation law in this particular respect.

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is the thing we are trying to get away from, as in the case of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]. Without the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri if any Member of this House is not dependent on his wife for support and his wife is killed he could not recover one cent from the Government. He could not recover unless he could show dependency. We are not trying to enact a compensation law as to all classes in the United States. I think careful consideration should be given to some of these amendments.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If this law is put on the statute books it is going to be regarded by many people as something that ought not to be changed. I think, regardless of what the committee is going to do, the suggestion made by the gentleman bears out other suggestions that have been made here. When once we write this into law it will become more and more difficult to get relief for claimants.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I do not think that was understood when we voted on the Cochran amendment.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, under which many cases might be included?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WELSH].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 208. The provisions of this title shall not apply to—

(a) Any claim for which compensation is provided by the Federal employees' compensation act, as amended, or by the World War veterans' act of 1924, as amended.

(b) Any claim for injury or death incurred in line of duty by any member of the military or naval forces of the United States in cases where relief is provided by other law.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: Page 14, line 19, after the word "amended," insert "(United States Code, title 5, ch. 15)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: Page 14, line 20, after the word "amended," strike out the period, insert a comma and "(United States Code, title 38, ch. 10, as amended)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 209. The act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 43. That this act may be cited as the Federal employees' compensation act."

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: Page 15, line 4, after the word "amended," insert "(United States Code, title 5, ch. 15)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 301. When used in this act—

(a) The term "department or establishment" means any executive department or independent establishment not in the legislative or judicial branches of the Government, or any corporation acting as a governmental instrumentality or agency in which the United States owns or controls 51 per cent or more of the voting shares and securities;

(b) The term "officer or employee of the Government" means any officer or employee of any department or establishment as above defined, any member of the military or naval forces of the United States, or any other person acting on behalf of the United States in any official capacity under or by authority of any such department or establishment; and

(c) The term "acting in the scope of his office or employment," in the case of any member of the military or naval forces of the United States, means acting in line of duty and, in the case of an officer or employee of any corporation acting as a governmental instrumentality or agency, means acting in the execution of a governmental activity.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERHILL: Page 15, line 16, strike out the semicolon, add a comma, and the following: "but shall not include the Panama Railroad."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 302. In any claim brought under this act the head of the executive department or other independent establishment or governmental instrumentality shall, as a part of the determination or decision, determine and allow reasonable attorney's fees, not to exceed 15 per cent of the amount recovered, if recovery be had, to be paid out of the amount recovered to the attorneys of the claimant. Any attorney who charges, demands, receives, or collects for services rendered in connection with such claim any amount other than that allowed under this section, if recovery be had, shall upon conviction thereof be subject to a fine of not more than $2,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 16, line 7, after the word "establishment," insert a comma and the word "court," so as to read: "establishment, court, or governmental instrumentality."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERHILL: Page 16, line 7, after the word "establishment," insert a comma and the word "court."

Mr. BLANTON. So that the limitation as to the fees an attorney may lawfully charge will apply to a judgment in court as well as to an adjudication by the department. That is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes. That was inadvertently left out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. In line 9, page 16, strike out the figures "15" and insert the figures "10."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDSPETH: Page 16, line 9, strike out the figures "15" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "10."

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to offer any strenuous objection to this except to say it has been the practice of the committee in the past to make this a 15 per cent limitation. I have never tried a case in my life and therefore, as I say, I shall not make any strenuous objection to this amendment.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that when they go before a department a Congressman will do the work, so that if an attorney receives 10 per cent that is sufficient.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, just a word before we rush over this hastily. This includes an action in court, and there is not a lawyer here who has taken a case in court on a contingent basis that has ever charged as little as 10 per cent where his entire fee depended upon the success of his efforts.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does the gentleman contend that when an attorney presents a case to the department through his Congressman he ought to have as much as 15 per cent?

Mr. RAMSEYER. But this includes cases in court.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Since the gentleman has stated that this includes cases in court, I think the lawyers ought to receive more than 10 per cent, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLANTON: On page 1, lines 1 and 2, strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do this, knowing there is no chance in the world of accomplishing my purpose, but I do it to expedite the time of the House. There ought to be a roll call on this bill, but it is so late I hesitate to ask the Members to come over when so few would register their votes against this bill.

This is one of the wildest pieces of legislation that has been sought to be passed since I have been here, and it is going to come home to plague some of you as sure as you live. We can get at least a rising vote here, and I take it there will be half a dozen here who will vote against the bill, and there ought to be a record here that at least half a dozen Members of this House do not believe in this kind of legislation, and do not believe in passing the responsibility which the Constitution places upon our shoulders to some bureau chief.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman can get a roll call on this bill if he will allow it to go to the previous-question stage. We shall not have the roll call to-night, but will have it to-morrow.

Mr. BLANTON. With that understanding, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 303. Section 173 of the Judicial Code is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 173. No claim shall be allowed by the accounting officers or the head of any executive department or other independent establishment or governmental instrumentality or by any court of the United States, or by the Congress to any person where such claimant or those under whom he claims shall willfully, knowingly, and with intent to defraud the United States have claimed more than was justly due in respect of such claim or presented any false evidence to Congress or to any department, establishment, instrumentality, or court in support thereof."

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: Page 16, line 18, after the word "Code," insert a comma and the following: "(United States Code, title 28, sec. 280)."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McDUFFIE: Page 17, line 1, strike out line 1 after the word "have" down to and including the word "or," in line 2.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this amendment strikes out the language, "claimed more than was justly due in respect of such claim." Who is going to be the judge of whether they have claimed more than was justly due? I submit to the chairman of the committee that it is perfectly proper to bar a claim and the man who makes a false affidavit in an effort to establish a spurious claim. This is proper and should be done, but when you go so far as to say that a man must be barred because he has claimed more than is justly due, then you are entering a field where it is almost impossible for anybody to pass judgment on the merits of a case.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. This is the exact wording of the law which has worked so efficiently and so delightfully that I do not know but what it may be followed here.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman repeatedly, this afternoon, has referred to a law that is already upon the statute books. We are trying to improve the law, as I take it. Just because it is now the law does not make it a sacred thing. Again I say, the very reason I am fearful about the results of this legislation is that when we come to Congress hereafter with a bill for the relief of some claimant, some one on the floor will refer to this statute and say, "By express act of Congress you have had your day in court, and the department has said you are not entitled to relief; therefore I object to the consideration of the bill."

The laws that are already on the statute books are subject to change. Are our laws to be like the laws of the Medes and Persians? If necessary, any statute should be changed to meet new conditions. Who is going to pass judgment on the question of whether a man is claiming more than is justly due? It looks to me as if it were a foolish provision.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BEEDY. I would like to ask the chairman a question. The gentleman states this law has long been on the statute books. How in the world has any claim ever been passed upon that involved this broad question as to what was justly due or that the amount claimed was more than was justly due?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Well, I suppose some man with a mind that was trained in some law school thought this was necessary. I do not know.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I doubt that very much.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I am not the author of it, and would never have written it except you will notice on the same page the language, "shall willfully, knowingly, and with intent to defraud," and so forth.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The chairman has the correct idea about that. It is not the presenting of claims for more than is justly due, but the presentation of such a claim, willfully, knowingly, and with intent to defraud. That is what is intended to be covered in this section.

Mr. BEEDY. If the gentleman please, if a man has presented a claim which has been proven to have been willfully and knowingly presented with intent to defraud, then the rest of it is mere surplusage.

Mr. RAMSEYER. No; if he presents a claim for more than is justly due or presents any false evidence, willfully, knowingly, and with intent to defraud. It is not the mere presentation. Some witness might give false evidence. The mere filing of false evidence alone would not be sufficient to bar his claim. The claimant must do this willfully, knowingly, and with intent to defraud.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Then is not the language with respect to claiming more than is justly due mere surplusage? Of course, if the claimant is willfully and knowingly trying to defraud the Government that is as far as we need go.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If a person presented a claim for $10,000 and honestly thought he was entitled to that amount, when in truth and in fact he was only entitled to $3,000——

Mr. McDUFFIE. Who is going to say whether or not he was honest in doing that?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Of course, the question of fraud and of willfulness and whether it was knowingly done has to be determined by somebody. As to claims up to $5,000 this will be decided by the department head and from $5,000 up it will be decided by the courts.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Suppose a claim was filed for many times as much as ordinarily would seem to be just and right?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, in order to give the gentleman from Alabama an opportunity to finish his statement.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Suppose the department head were to decide that the claim was for so much more than seemed proper it was willfully done with a view to defraud the Government. I dislike to find myself differing with many here whose judgment I respect so much, but I am very fearful as to the results of this legislation. It occurs to me that we should provide some machinery in this House to deal with this problem and not surrender the legislative prerogatives of the Congress to the bureaus of this Government. I am not unmindful of the apparent difficulties confronting the Claims Committee, but it does seem that we are here proposing to shift our responsibilities to those bureaus. Surely we already have enough bureaucratic control in our Government. These bureau chiefs and department heads already have just as much as they can do. I do not believe they want any such further responsibilities placed upon them. To make them judges of the law and the facts and give them the power to determine in ex parte proceedings the rights of citizens having claims against the Government, is carrying this thing too far. If the Congress is incapacitated to deal with this problem of claims against the Government then I am mistaken in my judgment of the ability of its Members. If the Claims Committee, composed as it is of most estimable and hardworking Members, can not cope with the problem, let us enlarge the membership of the committee, or create within the membership of the Congress an additional committee or commission to aid in the adjudication of these claims.

The language of this section was written in another law, wherein a commission passed judgment upon claimants' rights; but here one man, a bureau chief, can, if he is so disposed, arbitrarily decide that the claim filed, because of the amount asked, is filed with the willful intent to defraud, and where on earth is there any right to appeal from his decision in so far as this bill is concerned? With all due deference and respect for those who have sponsored this bill, I believe the day will come when they themselves will regret writing into the law of our land the provisions of this bill. I realize my protest against this bill will not prevent its passage, but I can not remain silent nor can I approve this venture into a new, unknown, and uncharted sea. I fear for those citizens who may come in the future to their Government praying for relief in small amounts. Why should Members of Congress remain here if our bureaus are to legislate? We surrender more and more every year to bureaucracy. What will the harvest be?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I will say to the gentleman that, so far as this language is concerned, I think it is all right. I am opposed to the first title of the bill, and I am going to vote against it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I think we will all rue the day we vote for it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the first part of the bill were properly guarded and provided for judicial review in claims up to $5,000, where the chief or head of the department has passed upon it and decided against it, and a proper limitation placed on the amount the Government could be sued in tort cases, I might vote for it. However, this particular provision is all right, and I think is a proper provision in the law. The vicious part of the bill is Title I as it now is before us.

Mr. UNDERHILL. This very language has been used in the law ever since 1874, and I do not know that anyone has ever questioned it.

Mr. BEEDY. May I now ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. BEEDY. I ask this question of the gentleman as a lawyer. If after one proves a case of fraud, does not this language add an additional burden?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The claimant is not in there to prove fraud.

Mr. BEEDY. Suppose we attempt to punish a man under this provision, and having proved that he is guilty because he presented a fraudulent claim, why go further and necessitate proof that he has asked for more than was justly due? Who knows what is justly due?

Mr. RAMSEYER. If he seeks more than is justly due with intent to defraud, his claim must be disallowed under this section. If it was without such intent, it does not bar him.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Would not he be shut out absolutely if the officer or department head passing upon his claim decided his claim was fraudulent and that he was not entitled to anything? Remember, too, from that decision he has no appeal.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The trouble is not with this section; the trouble lies in the first title of the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. We may have to take the bill whether we like it or not.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then vote to defeat it, as I intend to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded with and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My own views on the bill are so firmly fixed that I will not have relieved myself of my duty unless I express my opposition to the measure. I am opposed to the bill for many reasons. There is no time now for me to express them in any systematic way. In the first place, looking at it as a protection to the Government, claims for injuries and damages will be determined by the clerical force of the departments—and that is the danger of the measure—we leave it to this clerical force, without qualification or training, to decide claims for negligence up to $5,000.

Are we, the representatives of the Government, to turn over this great duty to pass upon claims amounting to millions and millions of dollars to officials without qualifications and wholly unjudicial by reason of the very nature of this work? I should hope not.

Second, the bill denies to all claimants of damages up to $5,000 and under the right of suit or the right of review. I repeat this, because in claims exceeding this amount, on the other hand, there is given the right of suit in court to those whose claims exceed this amount. Therefore we make a marked discrimination between the poor people and the well to do, between claims of $5,000 and those of larger sums, giving one remedy to one and two remedies to the other. I for one am not willing to subscribe to such arbitrary inconsistency, to such cruel injustice.

Coming now to the practical working of the bill, whenever the certification by these clerks is against the payment of the claim, I submit that will end it. The reply is made that there will be as much right then to introduce a bill into the House as now. Technically that is true, but practically that is not true, because as soon as the bill is rejected by the department you will not be able to bring it up in this House again, no matter how meritorious it may be. Why? Because the bill has been rejected in pursuance of the law that gave the specific power to the department to do that very thing.

Those are some of the reasons why I suggest that we are not improving our present unhappy condition and why I think we will suffer less from the injustices we bear than those to which we would fly. [Applause.]

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 11, line 10, for the purpose of reoffering the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], which I know the Members of the House did not understand when they voted it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to return to page 11 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: Page 11, subsection (c), strike out the subsection and substitute the following:

"(c) The term 'widower' means the deceased's husband living with her at the time of her death."

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of this section of the bill no man could recover for the wrongful death of his wife unless he were dependent upon her for his support. In the Committee on Claims we have had claims in which constituents of ours have been given certain amounts, usually $5,000, on account of the wrongful death of a wife. It would not make a particle of difference who the man was, whether it be you or one of your constituents, who lost his wife through any kind of negligence on the part of any Government employee acting within the scope of his authority, under the language of the bill you could not recover one cent, because you are not dependent upon her. I think this amendment clearly should be agreed to if the bill is to become a law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 5 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WHITEHEAD: Page 5, after subsection (5), add two new subsections, as follows:

"(6) Any claim arising out of the activities or work of the Government, its agents or employees, relating to flood control.

"(7) Any claim arising out of the activities of the Government, its agents or employees relating to river and harbor work."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, just one word. I entirely agree with the amendment offered by the gentleman so far as it goes, but think we ought to have a very much broader provision. However, I agree that the bill will be improved with this provision, but I hope when it goes to the other House it will be broadened.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I think that covers those propositions about as broadly as you can make it. There may be other things that should be included as well. In the event there is a committee on conference on this bill, that committee might work out a much broader amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAGUARDIA, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9285) to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

EXECUTION OF CERTAIN AGREEMENTS OF INDEMNITY

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa presents a privileged report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report on the bill (H. R. 10954) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to execute agreements of indemnity to the Union Trust Co., Providence, R. I., and the National Bank of Commerce, Philadelphia, Pa.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CRAMTON, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted for printing under the rule a conference report and accompanying statement on the bill (H. R. 9136) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

AN UNDESIRABLE LOBBYIST

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes in reference to a matter involved in the conference report on the Interior Department appropriation bill; and I also ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a circular of scandalous character has been distributed among many Members. None was sent to me by its author, though it is directed against me, but a copy was handed to me. It contains a number of elaborate misrepresentations and falsehoods, as I myself would know to expect from the signatures, but the House should understand it as well.

The circular reads as follows:

FEBRUARY 15, 1928.

ONE MAN DOMINATING THE SENATE AND HOUSE—THE SHAME OF THE FLATHEAD INDIAN SPOLIATION

An unconscionable situation has come about.

Against a unanimous Senate and the unanimous action of the Senate conferees, the spoliation of the Flathead Indian Tribe is about to be insured, and the biggest water power in the Northwest is about to be given to the lowest corporate bidder for a sum more than $11,000,000 below the proper commercial rental.

The House, totally uninformed, is being used as a battering ram by one man—Mr. LOUIS C. CRAMTON, chairman of Appropriations for the Interior Department.

Mr. CRAMTON closed his appropriations hearings to those who would have exposed his scheme.

He and his House conferees refused to sit with the Senate conferees to hear the realities presented. Even Senators WALSH, WHEELER, and LA FOLLETTE could not be heard by Mr. CRAMTON.

No word of debate on this outrageous scheme has passed on the House floor.

Because Mr. CRAMTON tied this scheme into the general appropriation bill, he apparently will triumph in it. The Senate can not permanently hold up the general appropriation bill.

House Members might yet redeem the situation if they would rise on the floor and insist on the light being shed.

What a spectacle of parliamentary government!

THE AMERICAN INDIAN DEFENSE ASSOCIATION (INC.).
THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF AMERICAN INDIANS (INC.).
THE FLATHEAD TRIBE,
By A. A. GRORUD, General Attorney for the Tribe.

No spoliation of the Flathead Tribe is about to be "insured." No water power is about to be given to the lowest corporate bidder. The Interior bill gives no water power to anyone, it only authorizes the Federal Water Power Commission "in accordance with the Federal water power act and upon terms satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior to issue a permit," and so forth. The House is not totally uninformed, but on the contrary many of its Members have for three years made a study of the Flathead problem, long hearings of reputable witnesses have been held, and the question has been several times before this House; and the proposition now in the bill is substantially as sent to Congress by the President in his budget. I did not close our hearings to anyone who could give our committee information, but we did not, for obvious reasons, hear John Collier or this Grorud person.

From whom, then, can come such effrontery, such scandalous mess of falsehoods?

It is signed by the American Indian Defense Association (Inc.), which is run by John Collier, whom I discussed on this floor. Also signed by the National Council of American Indians (Inc.), a subsidiary of the other corporation.

Also it is signed "The Flathead Tribe, by A. A. Grorud, general attorney for the tribe," who no doubt wrote it.

He is not their attorney, general or special. What he really is is set forth in a letter addressed to Mr. Richard A. McLeod, an Indian of Ronan, Mont., from Mr. R. Lee Word, who is an ex-judge of the Supreme Court of Montana, which reads as follows:

HELENA, MONT., December 24, 1927.

MR. RICHARD A. MCLEOD, Ronan, Mont.

DEAR SIR: I answer your letter of the 16th, but mailed the 19th, as follows:

In June of last year was employed to look into the estate of H. H. Potting, deceased, and find why it was that with no claims of any consequence and no debts there was no money for the heirs who lived in St. Louis.

Looked into the matter, examined the records of the court in the case, talked with the judges, the county attorney, and others, and learned:

That Grorud had been both the attorney for the purchaser of the property belonging to the estate and attorney for the estate at one and the same time, without the knowledge or consent of the judges of the court of this county.

That Grorud had been given a check for $250 by his client, the purchaser of the property, to buy of the estate he represented its property. This check Grorud deposited to his own credit in the bank.

Grorud made a bid of $250 for the property of the estate and the return of sale and the order confirming sale as originally made and filed recited that the property of the said estate had been sold for $250; but

After said papers and orders had been filed in and become a part of the records in said case Grorud erased said figures $250 or attempted to do so, and wrote over them the figures $131.15 as the amount bid by his client for the property of said estate.

To put it succinctly, I charged Grorud with having committed in the Potting case a fraud upon the court; with having altered and mutilated the records of said court; with having embezzled $118.85 of the moneys of said estate; with having filed false vouchers in said estate; and I am informed that the attorney selected by the supreme court of the State to make a preliminary survey of the charges contained in the complaint filed by me was reported to the court that each and all of said charges are sustained by the record and evidence.

Does the above answer your letter?

Yours very truly,

R. LEE WORD,
Attorney at Law.

Guilty of fraud upon the court, altering and mutilating records of the court, embezzling small sums from his Indian clients, for whom he pretends to be so zealous, he is now trying to show cause why he should not be disbarred.

I also desire to put into the RECORD a statement from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Hon. Charles H. Burke, in which he charges Mr. Grorud with falsehoods, and says he is not now attorney for the Indians, but when he was their attorney he was so negligent that the Flatheads lost important rights:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 30, 1928.

HON. REED SMOOT,
Chairman Interior Department Subcommittee,
Appropriations Committee, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR SMOOT: Referring to the statement of A. A. Grorud before the Appropriations Committee this morning that there was an understanding that he would not be expected to file a petition in behalf of the Flathead Tribe under the Flathead jurisdictional act of March 13, 1924 (43 Stat. L. 21), and also his statement about splitting attorney fees; you are advised that both of these statements made by Mr. Grorud are without any basis of fact and are absolutely false in their entirety.

Mr. Grorud had a contract to represent the Flathead Indians under the jurisdictional act, but he failed to file the petition in the Court of Claims within the time limit in that act, and therefore the Flathead Indians have lost their opportunity to prosecute their claims under the jurisdictional act because of the neglect and failure of Mr. Grorud to perform his duties under the contract.

It is contended by Mr. Grorud that he has authority to represent the Flathead Tribe on other tribal matters. This also is an incorrect statement. The law—section 2103 of the Revised Statutes—requires such contracts to be approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, but no such contract with Mr. Grorud has ever been approved.

Mr. Grorud has attempted to collect considerable money amounting to approximately $10,000 from the Flathead tribal funds for alleged services rendered to the tribe as their alleged attorney. This claim has not and will not be paid because he has no such contract and no authority under existing law to represent those Indians in tribal matters other than as referred to in the contract under the jurisdictional act.

The statements of Mr. Grorud before the committee, both on Saturday and this morning, in regard to Indian matters generally, are equally as untrue as are his other statements referred to herein.

The five-year program criticized by Mr. Grorud is one of the outstanding efforts of the Indian Bureau to make Indians industrious and self-supporting citizens, so that they may live in good homes, cultivate their lands, raise stock, and have an income of their own.

Mr. Grorud has repeatedly tried to create the impression, both in the minds of the Flathead Indians and in the minds of the public at large, that the Indian Bureau is endeavoring to deprive the Flathead Indians of their rights to the proceeds from the Flathead power sites. No such action is contemplated by the Indian Bureau. Our contention is that the net proceeds from the power development on the Flathead Reservation should go to the Flathead Indians. However, no contract of any kind has been made in regard to the development of the power sites on the Flathead Indian Reservation.

Cordially yours,

CHAS. H. BURKE, Commissioner.

I call attention to this letter so that the House may understand what kind of an irresponsible and undesirable mind could originate such a circular as is put before you. The courts of Montana can disbar him from practicing before them. Congress should be able to exile such an undesirable lobbyist from its corridors.

As to the matter referred to therein, the claim that the Flathead Indians are being despoiled of what belongs to them, and that the water power is being given to a great corporate bidder, that will be brought up for discussion in the consideration of the conference report hereafter.

REPLY OF PUBLIC PRINTER GEORGE H. CARTER TO THOMAS L. BLANTON

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. In connection with my report on the Government Printing Office, which was printed in the RECORD of December 7, 1927, the Public Printer desires to have his defense of his office go in the permanent RECORD in connection with that report at the end of my speech. I have submitted the matter to the Speaker, and it is satisfactory to the Speaker. The personal allusions in his letter have been shown to the Speaker and they will be eliminated. I ask unanimous consent that that be inserted in the permanent RECORD at the end of my speech December 7, 1927, in accordance with the arrangement with the Speaker.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I understand nothing is to be inserted but that letter?

Mr. BLANTON. Nothing else. Some personal allusions in the letter are to be eliminated, which the Speaker understands.

Mr. SNELL. He approves of it?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. This is in relation to the letter received from the Public Printer some time ago?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. That letter, with the personal allusions eliminated, goes into the permanent RECORD at the end of my report of December 7, 1927.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

I would ask the Secretary to make an extract from the petitions, together with the names of the women's clubs and other organizations represented in preparing the petitions and securing the signatures, and that that much be noted in the RECORD, and that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The petitions presented by Mr. EDGE pray for the adoption of any effective resolutions in Congress or the negotiation of treaties with France or other nations which clearly provide for the arbitration of disputes in such manner as to consist of a real forward step in the use of arbitration as the means to prevent war, and are sponsored and indorsed by the following organizations in the State of New Jersey:

Mr. JONES. I have a number of letters in my office in the nature of petitions which were sent to me with reference to the tariff on shingles. I have not brought them to the Senate, but I wanted to make a statement regarding them. I have a letter here from the cedar industry, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES CEDAR INDUSTRY TARIFF COMMITTEE,
Everett, Wash., February 9, 1928.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Our industry recently mailed you some red-cedar shingles, and inclosed is an industry statement.

We are only asking the right to be permitted to live in the United States and continue a legitimate business.

Existing tariff laws have already exterminated over half of our industry and fully half of what remains is actually bankrupt. This is the positive and indisputable result of congressional discrimination against our industry, its American labor, and incident business.

The United States charges an import tax on logs if shipped to American mills for manufacture by American workmen, grants unrestricted exportation of American logs, and permits free and unlimited importation of shingles and cedar lumber to American markets.

Canada charges an export tax on logs, rigidly restricts log exportations, and even prohibits log exportations to American mills. Sales and import taxes bar American cedar products from Canadian markets.

The operative effect is: United States tariff protection to foreign productive and Canadian oriental labor, preference of oriental labor over American labor, idleness of American labor, causing an annual $10,000,000 wage loss, forcing hunger and insufficient clothing to thousands of American workmen, their wives and children, stagnation to American business, and extermination to an important American industry.

This is not a mere incident in business; it is actual industry crucifixion by an act of our own Congress.

We are only asking for fairness and justice.

Yours very truly,

A. C. EDWARDS,
Tariff Committee Chairman.

Mr. JONES also presented a resolution adopted by the Yakima County (Wash.) Grange Committee, protesting against the passage of the so-called Crisp bill proposing to appropriate $10,000,000 for the purpose of buying waste lands and abandoned farms, securing settlers and developing waste lands, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Colonel Willett Council, No. 58, Junior Order United American Mechanics, at Rome, N. Mr. WILLIS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 2506) to amend the packers and stockyards act, 1921, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CUTTING presented a letter in the nature of a petition from Edgar F. Craighead, adjutant New Mexico Casual Post, No. 614, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Fort Bayard, N. Mex., with an accompanying resolution, relative to the establishment of a national cemetery at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS,
Fort Bayard, N. Mex., February 1, 1928.

Hon. BRONSON CUTTING,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am attaching hereto a resolution adopted at a recent meeting held by the above-captioned post, and we are of the opinion that we are entitled to a national cemetery here. At present we have 1,185 filled graves and some 2,000 plotted empty graves, and I am sure that you will agree with us that when a man has given his life for his country he is surely entitled to have his last resting place taken the proper care of. The graves here date back to the Indian wars, and no doubt in some cases there is no living relative of the man buried here. We have no funds or appropriations to disburse in this manner; the Veterans' Bureau have taken the attitude of hands off. The patients here are certainly not able to take care of it.

I would suggest that you take this matter up with Hons. BRATTON and MORROW, and advise me as to what the possibility is of getting a national cemetery here at Fort Bayard, N. Mex. Also I request that you read or have read the attached resolution on the floor of the House, and have same entered in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Trusting that you will give the above-mentioned matter your usual prompt attention and consideration, and assuring you that we stand ready at all times to assist in whatever way we can. I am, believe me,

Sincerely,

EDGAR F. CRAIGHEAD,
Adjutant New Mexico Casual Post, No. 614,
Veterans of Foreign Wars, Fort Bayard, N. Mex.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS,
Fort Bayard, N. Mex.

Resolution adopted by New Mexico Casual Post, No. 614, Veterans of Foreign Wars, at regular meeting held January 17, 1928, at Fort Bayard, N. Mex.:

Whereas there are 1,185 filled graves in the cemetery at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., some of them dating back to the Indian wars, and the United States Veterans' Bureau recently plotted 2,000 or more empty graves; and

Whereas there are no funds or appropriations available to give the cemetery the proper care and the United States Veterans' Bureau does not take the proper care of same, as they term it special work: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the New Mexico Casual Post, No. 614, Veterans of Foreign Wars, at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., go on record expressing their desire to have the cemetery here converted into a national cemetery, whereby the graves of our departed comrades will have the proper care through Federal aid; and be it further

Resolved, That we request you, Hon. BRONSON M. CUTTING, to introduce a bill in Congress making the cemetery here a national cemetery.

EDD. ZINGG, Commander.
EDGAR F. CRAIGHEAD, Adjutant.

[See the bill (S. 3262) to establish a national cemetery at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., introduced to-day by Mr. CUTTING.]

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Elizabeth A. Manion, sister of Mary Kenny, who was an attendant in charge of the ladies' retiring room in the Senate Office Building, six months' compensation at the rate she was receiving by law at the time of her death, the said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

INVESTIGATION OF RATES ON BITUMINOUS COAL

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, during the debate yesterday mention was made of the advisability of an investigation with reference to coal rates. I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce a resolution concerning that subject and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 150), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, or a subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to make an investigation of the existing rate structures of freight rates on bituminous coal moving in interstate commerce to determine whether there exist injustices and unfairness therein and whether any mining districts are being unfairly or abnormally stimulated and overdeveloped or are being depressed thereby.

Also, to investigate and ascertain the power, authority, and practices of the Interstate Commerce Commission under existing law to control the minimum freight rates to be charged by railroads for the purpose or with the effect of increasing or preventing competition between mining districts located in different States by equalizing the costs of production and distribution in industry through the requirement of transportation charges upon bituminous coal that are more than compensatory to the carriers performing the services of distribution.

And particularly to investigate and ascertain the effect on the bituminous-coal industry and coal-mining districts of the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee of the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the reduction of and/or the refusal to permit the reduction of freight rates on bituminous coal by the carriers serving said States.

Upon the conclusion of the investigation the committee shall forthwith report to the Senate.

The expenses of said committee or any subcommittee thereof hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Said committee is empowered to sit and act at such time or times and at such place or places as it may be deemed necessary and to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, and to do such other acts as may be necessary in the matter of said investigation.

The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Any person who, having been summoned as a witness, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation hereby authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. SACKETT. I suggest that the resolution be referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so referred.

CONSIDERATION OF BRIDGE BILLS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have in charge five bridge bills which are now in the hands of the Committee on Commerce and not yet on the calendar. They are House bills Nos. 7032 to 7036, inclusive. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce may be discharged from the further consideration of the bills and that they be passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the five bridge bills indicated by him, and that the bills be put on their passage. Is there objection?

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the bills; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider them in their order. The bills were severally reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES EVANS HUGHES

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech made by former Secretary Hughes at the Pan American Conference in Habana.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF MR. HUGHES'S ADDRESS

Mr. President, I have listened with deep interest to the admirable statement of Doctor Alfaro in reviewing the history of the conferences to promote the peaceful settlement of controversies in this hemisphere.

I wish to join in the expression uttered by others in appreciation of the care with which Doctor Alfaro has prepared his report, but more especially in recognition of the admirable spirit, the fine generous vision which has animated all that he has said. Permit me also to take this opportunity of expressing entire accord with the proposal of Doctor Gonzales, of Mexico, with respect to the resolution which might be properly adopted by this conference.

It is my happy privilege to say for the United States of America that we would join most heartily in a declaration that there shall be no war of aggression in America. I am in entire accord with the proposal that we should show that this hemisphere is dedicated to the interests of peace, and that we should endeavor to find pacific solutions for all the controversies that may arise.

Without suggesting any superiority for ourselves, we have very happy traditions in this hemisphere. Most of the controversies that have vexed us have already been settled. Very few remain. They can be adjusted peaceably.

THREE WAYS OF SETTLEMENT

If we have this high aim of securing pacific adjustment of our difficulties, we shall not fail to attain it. And I am happy to join in that effort to which, not simply speaking from the position as chairman of the American delegation—important as that is—but speaking out of my own heart, I would wish to give all the strength and energy that I possess.

How shall we promote peaceful settlement? I think there are three ways:

First. By conferences. By those important periodical meetings at which we can promote a better acquaintance and have a candid interchange of views.

Second. By means of conciliation. That is to say, the provision of some practical means by which when difficult situations arise reason may have its play before force takes the field.

Third. In the judicial settlement of controversies. Reason and justice must have their institutions. They can not exist merely as abstract concepts to which we pay our verbal devotion. We must have institutions of peace. The great problem is how to establish them; how to secure agreement upon them.

What Doctor Maurtua has just said, it seems to me, is full of wisdom. He desires that we shall go as far as we can and that then we shall endeavor, step by step, to make a progressive approach to our ideals. Those are the words not only of a jurist but of a statesman.

EXCEPTIONS TO ARBITRATION

The important question before us is with respect to the project which Doctor Alfaro has presented. It has been subjected to an analysis in a very clear, illuminating, and forceful manner by Doctor Lira, president of the Chilean delegation. That analysis makes it unnecessary for me to dwell at length upon some of the questions involved.

Article 19 of the project provides that questions of whatever nature which may arise between two or more states which have not been settled through diplomatic channels shall be submitted to arbitration. But it is at once recognized in the following article, Article 20, that this generality must have some limitation.

While it is true that under article 21 it is provided that the question whether a controversy is included in the exceptions shall be submitted to arbitration, nevertheless that is not intended to destroy the exceptions. The provision may be open to the criticism which Doctor Lira has stated, but it must be supposed that, from the standpoint of the reporter, it was intended that the exceptions should be effective.

When the exception is set forth in article 20, the first exception, it is found that it eliminates controversies which involve constitutional provisions. I agree with Doctor Lira that this is extremely broad and vague. What are constitutional questions? Our genial Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States once said that a constitutional lawyer was one who had given up the practice of law and gone into politics. [Laughter.]

From the standpoint of the United States there are few questions that could not be claimed to involve constitutional provisions—if you say that all the powers and functions for which the Constitution provides are the subject of exception.

CATEGORIES OF CONTROVERSIES

Then in the second provision of article 20 reference is made to controversies which may place in jeopardy the independence of a State. I do not object to that, although I agree that it is very vague. I think, if I understand Doctor Maurtua aright, he thought "sovereignty and independence" would be a better expression. I agree to that.

The point I desire to make, however, is that these two classes of exceptions in article 20 reveal the consciousness of the necessity of some limitation. The question, then, is practically one which it is necessary for us to decide in approaching a convention. What will give appropriate expression to the limitations that are deemed to be essential?

Now, we have certain categories of controversies. We have controversies to which there are principles of law and of equity that are applicable. We call those justiciable questions. We could probably find a basis for agreement with regard to questions of that class.

I quite understand that questions of that class might sometimes involve sovereignty and independence. We can not make progress by putting our heads in the sand. No nation will knowingly submit to arbitration its sovereignty, whether it is called a justiciable question or has some other legal nomenclature to describe it. But we do have certain classes of cases which we call justiciable, which, with limited exceptions, we can agree upon.

POLITICAL AND INTERNAL AFFAIRS

Then there are controversies which are relating solely to political expediency and to which no principles of law or of equity apply. These give us the greatest difficulty. It is not that we object—or any of us here would object—to the impartial decision of the most enlightened mind representing the justice of the Deity even in such questions.

But we fail to find an assurance of that orderly and wise disposition in ordinary arbitral decisions. It is not the lack of a desire to have a pacific settlement, but the difficulty in the nature of the question, because you submit to the arbitrator something as to the decision of which he has no principle to guide him.

Then there is a third class of cases of controversies which should not be strictly regarded as international controversies at all. One state objects to the internal legislation of another state in a matter entirely within the province of that state. The objecting state should recognize that that is a matter of internal government. But internal government projects, in these days of intimate relations, in the actual force of its decisions, into areas where other governments seek to found a freer play.

So, about internal questions, some controversies may arise. We all have questions in each of our countries which we think are within our competency because they relate to internal administration. I could name some, and I could go around this room and enumerate questions of that sort which I am sure many of you would never submit to arbitration.

FEASIBILITY OF CLAIMS CONVENTIONS

Now, we must face the facts in this matter fairly. My conception of amity among the nations is a sort of friendship which will enable us to deal with these difficult questions in our negotiations with each other without the effort to compel nations to relinquish rights or to change their internal organization or to submit to the decrees of others in matters which affect internal regulations according to their conceptions of their interests. So our problem is what progress can we make?

There is one class of controversies about which we can make a convention without great difficulty. Those are controversies relating to questions involving the interpretation of treaties or the principles of international law, where the claims are for loss of life or personal injuries, or injuries to property, and where the reparation sought is entirely pecuniary.

We could have a claims convention without going into some of the difficulties which would arise in dealing with a broader convention. I do not mean to exclude the broader convention; I am simply thinking of making practical progress by having something on which we can start with a maximum of agreement. We can have two classes of convention, a convention relating to pecuniary claims and another convention relating to broader matters.

STANDING JOINT COMMISSIONS

When we come to the broader convention we would then consider the various categories of the controversies to which I have referred and endeavor to see how closely we can come to an agreement in sympathy with the principle Doctor Maurua has proposed of making all the progress possible.

I do not wish to detain the committee with a long statement, but I can not forbear to say that I think the project presented fails to exhaust the possibilities. While states might not be willing to submit to arbitration various delicate questions which they thought impinged upon the free exercise of their internal authority, still it might be possible to have joint commissions whose reports advising the different governments and legislatures would be of great value.

In 1909 the United States made its treaty with Great Britain with respect to Canada, establishing a joint commission in which each Government has an equal number of members, and to which all sorts of questions arising on our boundary can be referred for examination, the taking of testimony, and report to the respective Governments.

A nation may be willing, entirely willing, to have a permanent joint commission with its neighbor or neighbors, so that in any question that arises there may be an explication of the questions not for the purpose of decision but so that each government may be advised of the views and findings of a commission on which they have an equal representation, and then its legislature, supreme in its sphere, can act with that knowledge.

This plan has worked very well, and questions which might not perhaps have been submitted to arbitration—some of difficulty, some of delicacy—have been considered by the permanent joint commission and reports have been made which led to satisfactory adjustments.

Let us be astute to find means suited to the different exigencies which we can not escape.

PICKING THE THIRD ARBITRATOR

A final word: The test of arbitration and the weakness of plans for arbitration lie in the selection of the third arbitrator, as the case may be, who actually decides the controversy. Arbitrators are selected for the respective nations, and in some historic cases the arbitrator selected by one power has not supported that power, but those cases are extremely rare.

We know in advance the pivotal man, the third man, is the man who will decide. I have been in negotiations for arbitration where the names of the most distinguished jurists in the world have been submitted and eliminated. No agreement could be had.

The test of the arbitration agreement is in your plan for the selection of the third arbitrator. Reference was made to the apprehension of states in regard to arbitration. They center about this selection. Now, this project, when it comes to the final test where the parties do not agree, leaves the selection to chance.

That is to say, if there is no agreement, two chiefs of state are to be designated, one by each party, who maintain friendly relations with both parties; but in the language of treaties and diplomacy, friendship is not the same as it is in the language of social intercourse. There are chiefs of state at times whom we would not desire to select, although we would be far from suggesting that our relations in a diplomatic sense were not entirely friendly.

These two chiefs of state, one selected by each party, are designated, and one of these is to be selected by lot—for example, the flip of a coin!

SELECTION BY NONAMERICAN JURISTS

There are two objections: The first it is by chance, and the whole arbitration rests upon that. The broader you make the arbitration, the more important is this point. The second objection to such a method of choice is that it is essentially political.

I think we should endeavor to get away from a final selection in case we could not agree upon a third arbitrator, which would be in any manner influenced by political considerations. It might be impossible entirely to eliminate that feature, but we should strive in that direction in order to have an impartial, juridical settlement.

My suggestion would be that instead of providing for two chiefs of state, one to be selected by lot, that we should select three outstanding non-American jurists who should select with a sense of responsibility of their reputation and juridical standing, the third arbitrator, who, in that case might more closely approach to our ideal of an impartial judge. Such jurists would be more likely to give us the selection of some one on whom we could rely as not influenced by political considerations.

We often in our experience have had important interests come to us and say: "We would like to arbitrate our controversy. Can you suggest some one as an arbitrator?" And when that is stated to a judge, to a lawyer of eminence, to a man who has a reputation to sustain as an exponent of law and justice, he feels the greatest obligation to assist the parties to obtain an absolute, impartial, and just determination of their controversy.

PLEDGES OUR COOPERATION

Now, it is very late in our conference. We have been unable to reach this matter before. I do not wish to detain you with observations. I wish to join with you in this effort to the full extent of my ability. If we can not complete it now, let us prepare for a future day when we can accomplish our purpose with full consideration of all the questions which necessarily arise.

I desire to show to you the sincere cooperation of the United States, which is opposed to any act of aggression; which desires to see force eliminated from the hemisphere; which is seeking nothing but the good order, the independence, and the prosperity of all the American states. [Prolonged applause.]

SPEECH OF SENATOR RANSDELL AT RICHMOND, VA.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech by the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] in Richmond on the 16th instant.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, this is an unusual assemblage. In a long public career of forty-odd years I do not recall having attended a meeting such as this, where the promotion of good will among members of different creeds was the spirit of the occasion. I approve the idea heartily and am glad to contribute my mite toward its success. I hope the example you are setting will be emulated in many places throughout the Nation.

There is more good will on earth to-day than at any period of its history. Two thousand years ago war was universal and all prisoners taken in war were enslaved. Women had no rights men were bound to respect. There were no asylums or hospitals for the helpless and sick. Now, wars are the exception, not the rule; slavery has ceased in all civilized lands; women are equal to men in all respects; and every form of human suffering is relieved in asylums, homes, hospitals, and institutions of every kind conducted by all churches or the public. Even dumb animals are the recipients of human care and kindness. The golden rule, "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you," is practiced by a great many persons, and there is infinitely more good than bad among men. We expect good and it makes no impression on us, whereas grave crimes being abnormal are widely published and the thoughtless imagine that wickedness predominates. There is still much intolerance and hard feeling, due mainly to ignorance of the other party's viewpoint.

Good-will meetings such as this will help to sweep away the mists, to broaden our outlook on life, to make us more charitable, to realize that our neighbors are just as worthy people as ourselves, and to understand there is no genuine religion in hating those whose religious views differ from our own. In his farewell address to his countrymen the immortal Virginian, George Washington, said:

"The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels and joint efforts of common dangers, sufferings, and successes."

There are present at this banquet 150 Protestants and a like number of Jews and of Catholics. That independence and liberty we continue to possess, which was first secured by Washington and his compatriots, has been preserved by the joint efforts of all Americans, in common dangers, sufferings, and successes. We have differences of interest, race, and religion, but all work together for the good of our great country. There is a multitude of problems common to all of us. One part of the country may prosper, another suffer. To-morrow the case may be reversed. Respecting that liberty which belongs to the conscience of every man, we can and will, with good will to one another, help America to fulfill her destiny.

Bigotry, prejudice, petty jealousy, and kindred emotions are inimical to the welfare of the Nation. They are the products of deficient information and set brother against brother, banish the more kindly feelings of human nature, and falsify the expectations of the framers of the Constitution. It was the hope of our forefathers that this country would be and remain a united Nation, that unity would be the main pillar in the edifice of our independence, the support of our tranquillity at home, our peace abroad, our national safety, and prosperity.

It is my firm belief that the heart of America is tolerant and sincerely religious. The first settlers on our shores were men and women dominated by firm religious principles. What were they seeking? Merely the right to live their own lives in their own way, inspired by fervent zeal to be free in politics and religion. The Constitution guaranteed those rights, and they have been sanctioned and upheld for 140 years. Those who promote ill will and strife are enemies of that liberty and independence so dear to all our hearts, while they who assist in fostering good will are patriots who love their neighbors and their country.

GOOD WILL DISPLAYED DURING MISSISSIPPI RIVER FLOOD OF 1927

In agreeing to speak here to-night I realized my opportunity to bring before this fine audience the most remarkable exhibition of national good will in America since the World War. I allude to the terrible flood in the Mississippi Valley last year, which has been well described as the greatest peace-time disaster in our history. It is not my purpose to discuss the intricate economic and engineering questions connected with this flood, nor the difficult problem of preventing its repetition which Congress is now trying hard to solve. I merely wish to show how true and good were the people of the whole country when put to the test; how they proved by actions that they are their brothers' keepers; how genuine good will was displayed in a marked degree without regard to creed, race, or color.

I preface my remarks by recalling that about three years ago a Kentucky lad was wedged in a cavern. The Nation thrilled at every detail of the heroic efforts to release him from his underground prison. Men labored frantically and millions awaited news of his escape. At last he was reached, but death had already visited his prison. Several times since then the press has related the imprisonment of many men in mines. People read of their distress and hoped for their release. However, the anxiety was less than that for the lone country lad prisoned in the earth. A mass loses individuality; it merges into a general effect. Because of this psychology, perhaps, the magnitude of the miners' predicament tended to dull the ready sympathy which flows to a single fellow-being in distress. Multiply the case of the Kentucky lad by 600,000—more than half a million people in distress—and you will realize the magnitude of the Mississippi River flood of 1927.

THE RED CROSS BEGINS RELIEF WORK

Nature began setting the stage for the flood in August, 1926. All the land in the valley became saturated with water and was unable to soak up more. Rivers and streams in 31 States began to swell with rain water. They ultimately found their way to the mighty Mississippi, the Nation's drainage ditch, which became a turbulent, swirling, raging torrent early in the year. The waters poured through its channel, winding and rushing to the Gulf. Levees began to break in April. Homes were swept away, crops ruined, about 200 human beings and many thousands of livestock were drowned, farm implements destroyed, labor disorganized, people were driven from their homes, and vast numbers were marooned. The immense watery desert covered 20,000 square miles in the valley, which was damaged to the extent of approximately $300,000,000. From Cairo to the Gulf, a distance of a thousand miles, most of the land was under water, the width of the flood area reaching 80 miles in some places.

Governors and other officials in the valley States pleaded for boats, food, and clothing. Quick relief was needed. All eyes turned to the Red Cross, an international good-will organization which assists all human being who are in distress. Its past achievements have proved that it raises no barriers of wealth, occupation, religion, or race; that it has no political beliefs and recognizes no creed save that of service to suffering humanity. It immediately went into action and to its wonderful work in the stricken valley, I wish to pay just tribute. It opened headquarters in Memphis, Tenn., and sent trained workers to all critical points—to concentration centers, supply stations, and communities where levee breaks were expected. In that office the rescue work centered. A network of communication was established with all segments of the organization and all parts of the danger zone. The telegraph, telephone, and radio were brought to bear on the problem. A radio station was set up in the headquarters and 12 field radio units of the Signal Corps of the Army were scattered over the area at points where communication had already been washed out or where expected breaks would effect this in a few days. Supplementing these were river boats equipped with wireless, which formed part of the Red Cross fleet.

THOUSANDS ARE RESCUED BY RED CROSS

A rescue fleet was mobilized. Barges, side-wheel steamers, Mississippi River Commission boats, and every craft on the water was conscripted. Graceful pleasure yachts and odiferous fishing boats worked side by side. Patrol boats of the United States Coast Guard came at full speed to the scene of distress. Small power boats poured into Memphis by the carload. This great fleet sprang into existence almost overnight.

In the meantime the waters were rising and spreading in all directions. Quick action was necessary, for when a levee broke boats had to be there to save people in the path of the water. On a huge map in the Memphis office the location of every "mother ship" and her little fleet of small boats was recorded hourly. A plea for help would come to headquarters and immediately the boats nearest the new break would be directed to rush to the rescue. A few hours later hundreds of half-clothed, starving, weary refugees would joyfully sight the rescue ship fighting the torrential currents to get to them. Many acts of heroism by Red Cross workers and others went unnoticed which in normal times would have won the applause of the Nation.

One dark night a lone little woman was seen braving the raging Mississippi in an open launch. Her destination was Red Fork landing, in Arkansas, where a thousand refugees were marooned on a levee. Her small boat was loaded with food. Alone she crossed the river from the Mississippi side and gave provisions to the sufferers sufficient to keep them alive until a steamer could fight its way up the river and rescue them. She did this after one steamer had already tried unsuccessfully to brave the current earlier in the day.

Clinging to a levee in an almost inaccessible place stood 500 persons, half clothed, some of them sick, and one dying from a snake bite. Boats had tried and failed to rescue them. An old river captain turned a deaf ear to advice that the place was inaccessible. He knew a short cut to the levee; he turned his boat into a narrow bayou that was roaring like a miniature Niagara Falls. He plunged in, full steam ahead; great cypress trees were on either side of the boat, allowing just room enough for the vessel to pass. Slowly he moved on with the cumbersome river packet. A few hours later he returned to a Red Cross landing with the lone comment: "Dar's your folks."

For hours and hours a man had been maneuvering a small boat in and out among trees, over miles of yellow, muddy flood waters. He had naturally supposed that he was alone on this vast area of water. Suddenly he heard a plane overhead. The pilot swooped down with motor silenced. "Follow me!" he shouted to the boatman. The latter, startled and bewildered, gazed skyward whence this strange command had come. A moment of doubt, hesitation, indecision; then he swerved his little boat around and went at full speed in the plane's direction. Finally the plane seemed to pause in midair over a lone tree. The pilot circled it three times. The boatman steered ahead. Clinging desperately with one arm to a limb he found an exhausted, frightened woman and brought her to safety.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS RESPOND

It is impossible to estimate how many lives were saved by the fearless aviators. For several weeks they flew over the flooded area spotting stranded refugees, reported to the Red Cross where levees were "going out," and gave a daily picture of the entire situation. Dispatching emergency supplies of medicine and food, and transporting nurses, doctors, and other personnel were other functions of this squadron.

The relief organization of the Red Cross had the entire facilities of the Government at its disposal, without which the effective work to its credit would not have been possible. Airplanes, seaplanes, radio units, tents, cots, blankets, field kitchens, health officers, sanitary engineers, boats, and other equipment were procured from various governmental departments. The railroads throughout the valley rendered invaluable service during the disaster. Supplies were sent to concentration centers by the speediest routes. Passenger and freight trains speeded to the rescue of thousands when new breaks in the levees occurred, etc.

People outside the valley grew anxious for their fathers and mothers, sons and daughters, sweethearts and friends, living in the flooded areas. The bond of union always maintained by the Post Office Department was disrupted, but not discontinued. Through the tireless efforts of its agents, the mails moved and thereby kept those separated from home posted on the safety of relatives and friends.

SIX HUNDRED THOUSAND PEOPLE UNDER RED CROSS CARE

With the rescue work completed, the Red Cross turned its attention to the next phase of the giant task it had undertaken—caring for the refugees. On April 15 it had 25,000 flood sufferers in its charge. A week later this number had grown to 75,000 and rapidly increased, until finally 607,000 persons were being fed and cared for by this great altruistic organization. Twice it appealed to the country for $5,000,000 and in each instance the amount was oversubscribed within a week or 10 days after the issuance of each call. Big-hearted Americans gave more than $17,000,000 to the cause. Besides this relief fund from hundreds of sources, too numerous to mention, donations of supplies and services poured in. Carloads of food and clothing streamed in from Maine, Florida, California, Texas, Washington, and from practically every State in the Union. Never has this country seen such a spontaneous outburst of generosity and good will.

Approximately 150 refugee camps were established and the homeless were supplied with clothing, food, medical attention, and shelter. As is customary in all disasters, the responsibility for health work lies with State boards of health and the United States Public Health Service. In a supplemental way, however, the Red Cross expended huge sums in disease-prevention work. The magnitude of the health program surpassed anything of its kind ever attempted in America.

RECONSTRUCTION WORK

For weeks and weeks the camps were meccas for the refugees. Finally the waters receded. The empire had to be rebuilt and to that end the Red Cross worked hard. As the refugees returned to their homes, their quarters were screened and protected from mosquitoes, flies, and other germ-carrying insects. Tons of lime and other materials were used to combat the insanitary conditions, due to the presence on the land of dead animals and other débris. As a result, there was no serious outbreak of disease, and, as a matter of fact, health conditions have actually been better in the valley than they have been for several years.

While reconstruction needs of families differed in various localities, the main items supplied by the Red Cross were food, feed for livestock and poultry, clothing, medical aid, seed, household furnishings, building and repairs, livestock and poultry, and farm implements.

Nearly a year has passed since this great disaster, and I am sure the consensus of opinion throughout the Nation is that this chapter in American history has been closed, but it has not. Although the huge reconstruction program of the Red Cross draws nearer to completion, on January 9, 1928—just last month—the relief organization was still feeding 20,374 persons. However, economic, agricultural, and social conditions in the valley are progressing rapidly toward normalcy. It is rising from its ashes and has resumed its march of progress.

THE HEART OF AMERICA IS GENEROUS

The flood is now a thing of the past, but the outburst of good will displayed during the disaster will always be remembered by the grateful people of the valley. The heart of America is generous. Our shores have attracted the sons and daughters of all the races of the world and enjoys more than any other nation the unique mission of a broadcasting station for world brotherhood and good will.

If America is to rise to the sublime heights for which we believe she is destined, it is because we have striven to substitute justice and understanding for rivalry, jealousy, and prejudice.

THE STORY OF AL SMITH

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent to have an article written by Ray Tucker, one of the newspaper men in the press gallery of the Senate, published in the American Review of Reviews for February, inserted in the RECORD. It is entitled "The story of Al Smith."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Were it not that politicians are flighty fellows and soon stampeded, Alfred E. Smith's followers would have seen no cause for concern in the battle which Theodore Roosevelt was giving their idol for the governorship of New York in 1924. But at the moment the Smith people were highly apprehensive and emotional from the setback their hero's national ambitions had suffered at Madison Square Garden, and they took alarm at shadows. The governor's advisers came to regard Teddy as the toughest foe the happy warrior had faced since he first toed the mark for his long string of political victories back in the freebooting Tammany days of 1903.

By the time that Smith rode into Buffalo in the waning weeks of campaign the so-called insiders of Tammany Hall were frankly worried, and none more so than the board of strategists touring the State with "the guv'nor." They grew critical of the perfunctory fight he was waging. Thoughtful speeches on the problems of State government, they cautioned him, would never, never do. He must hit harder, demolish his young opponent with outright blows, and crush his pretensions to the executive mansion of the Empire State.

"Nope," replied Al, "you're all wrong. I'll win sympathy for him if I go after him too hard. I'll put myself in the position of a hard-boiled, elderly prosecutor demanding the death sentence for a boy in his teens. I'm going to let him hang himself, and all he needs is a little more rope. I was young myself once, and I know how they act."

Al was grinning now—a golden grin of pleasurable reminiscence and Gothic dentistry. His small eyes narrowed to slits of mischievous gray, his sharp chin stuck out, a sly smile played about his thin lips. He was not attempting to expound reactionism, individual complexes, or political strategy; without conscious effort he was dissecting human nature as he had found it in brushing both rough and polished elbows with it in a life bare of book knowledge, but brimful of living and Tammany teaching—an amazing and vicissitudinous career during which, in much the same manner as Fra Filippo Lippi, he has acquired a photographic understanding of the public temper that makes him one of the wariest and most dangerous foes in American public life.

"This young man," he mused, "is having a wonderful time. The big bosses are telling him he's a wonder; that he's in already. They always do; that's part of the game. Pretty soon the red fire will dazzle his eyes, the bands and the cheering will pound in his ears, and his head will swell. It happens to all of us when we're young. He'll begin to believe what they tell him and try to live up to it. He'll talk big and carelesslike—and then I'll smash him."

There was no kindliness in Smith's voice now, and before the harsh realities of practical campaigning which he pictured his counselors remained silent. Meanwhile his opponent continued his whirl about the State, and soon furnished the opportunity which Smith had predicted. Addressing the students of Hamilton University, Roosevelt congratulated them on their football conquest of Colgate. When collegiate mutterings warned him that he had fumbled the ball he begged them to assure him he was correct in his assumption that they had defeated their historic rivals.

"We lost," roared the misunderstood young men; whereupon Teddy turned to a group on his train platform and demanded, "Who told me that?"

The campaign might as well have ended there. It was the break for which Smith had been waiting. Thereafter, whenever Roosevelt discoursed on State finances, water power, education, the direct primary, or industrial legislation, Smith had but to ask: "I wonder who told him that!" With his almost perfect mimicry—in his youth Frohman tried to lure him onto the stage—Smith soon had the whole State laughing, and on great gales of merrymaking at his opponent's expense he was swept into office by a plurality of 107,000. That President Coolidge carried New York by 850,000 rendered the triumph all the more notable and significant.

Smith's whole career, in fact, has been one of waiting for the breaks, although there were years in which he dared not move to make them, and when he was the servant rather than the master of Tammany Hall.

THE SIDEWALKS OF NEW YORK

Smith was 30 years old when he entered the legislature, and he had revealed nothing of the ability which at 30 often marks men of final accomplishment. Nor was he, when "Big Tom" Foley nominated him for the assembly in the autumn of 1903, making much effort to prepare himself for the day which would bring opportunity or Tammany Hall knocking at the door of the shabby tenement in South Street, in which he had been born. At 30 he was wholly absorbed in the work and play of a young man on the lower East Side, where he had gained a local reputation as a cyclist, an amateur actor, a youngster of flashing Irish wit, and a son who was devoted to his mother.

The East Side of the eighties and nineties, in which Smith spent his boyhood and came to manhood, was vastly different from the East Side of to-day. Then it was rich in the humanities of companionship and conversation, knowing and yearning not for such manifestations of modernity as darkened and silent movie houses, motor cars, and jazz for two. Church sociables, picnics, and square dances, reached by travel in such gregarious vehicles as sleighs, buggies, and horse cars, tended to exalt forms of contact which were more lasting, though mayhap less stimulating, than modern society's mad dance of pleasure. Into this friendly and fertile soil Smith's roots go deep.

Although the death of his father interrupted his formal schooling at 13, it did not seriously alter the general trend of Smith's life. After a few years in an oil store, he obtained employment as checker in a Fulton fish market stall, and his years among the fish loom as large in his public career as the cherry tree in Washington's, the log cabin in Lincoln's, and the sap bucket in Coolidge's. With the brown derby which sits astride his pear-shaped head, his tilted cigar, his ageless grin, and his throaty voice booming out "The Bowery" or "The Sidewalks of New York," that fish market has always been good for headlines and votes.

As he approached manhood he left the market. He was working as a laborer in a Brooklyn pump factory when Foley picked him out from the gang that loitered around the Tammany clubhouse of the district, and nominated him as an assembly candidate in place of a man who had refused to do the bidding of the boss. It was hardly an auspicious beginning for the Smith who was, years later, to free Tammany of much of the odium born of its arbitrary attitude toward the individual and society. But such thoughts were apparently farthest from his mind at the moment; he was, it would appear, quite content to enter public life as the embodiment of the punishment which Tammany Hall summarily meted out to mutineers.

EARLY DAYS AS AN ASSEMBLYMAN

Few men have entered the Legislature of New York State with less visible equipment for political recognition and advancement than this assemblyman from the first Manhattan district. Neither he nor his associates sensed then how far his East Side training, his personal charm, his natural ability, and his fierce determination to succeed would carry him.

It was not until years later that Tammany, as well as the people of the State, were to recognize that he possessed that elusive, indefinable quality of character and personality which in some men flames into a genius for leadership in a country like the United States. For his present-day power over men and measures—and over himself—was slow to develop.

In those early legislative days his limitations appeared almost insuperable, and he was about ready to return to the fish stall or the pump factory.

"I was pretty discouraged," he explained many years later. "Tommy Cosgrave, another first-termer, was with me the night we took a pile of bills to our small hotel room. We spent an hour looking over those things beginning 'be it resolved,' and then we went for a walk along the river.

"'Tommy,' said I after a bit, 'we're in the wrong place. Whoever thought we were assemblymen?'

"'You're right,' said Tommy.

"'Yes,' said I, 'we can tell a hake from a haddock by the color of his eye, but we can't tell a bill from a bale of hay.'"

Smith stuck, although for two years his only legislative contribution was the introduction of six local and unimportant measures. But he was all ears and eyes. He gave close heed to the orators and parliamentarians of the day, and, later events were to show, he missed not a maneuver of Boss Barnes's Republican black cavalry as it rode roughshod over the Democratic minority.

Meanwhile he studied both the form and substance of resolutions, reports, appropriation bills, ancient and modern statutes, and legislative history, further enriching his political background through talks with veteran members. For literature, philosophy, and the elusive arts he had no time; it was practical information he was seeking. Most of his knowledge, in fact, has been acquired in the Socratic manner, and to this day he bases his most important decisions on data submitted orally by experts on any given subject..

His maiden speech, in retrospect at least, was not a happy one. It was delivered, apparently, because he felt that his support of such a measure as an election-recount proposal required an explanation, and for the further reason that the whole Tammany delegation had voted against the bill at the previous session.

"Mr. Speaker," said Smith, "I want to tell a story about two Scotchmen in explaining my vote. Said Sandy to Andy: 'Andy, why do you drink whuskey?' Answered Andy: 'For medicinal reasons; but, Sandy, why do you drink whuskey?' 'Because I like it,' replied Sandy. That's why I'm voting for this bill, Mr. Speaker—because I like it."

Smith was not quite candid with the Speaker, however, for it appears that he supported the measure because Mr. Murphy liked it. And for a dozen years the young legislator's conception of the obligations imposed on him by his oath of office was not different from that faintly expressed in his Sandy-Andy speech. As an inconspicuous member of the legislature, he always voted with the organization. Increasing influence meant little more to him than greater capacity for executing the orders of the boss.

His test of most measures, it appears, was their effect on the fortunes of the organization. During those years when the first flashes of liberalism were casting their radiance across other States, notably New Jersey under Woodrow Wilson and California under HIRAM JOHNSON, the Tammany group at Albany, under Smith's delegated domination, was killing most measures designed to strip the State of bossism and corporation control. To a friend who tried to interest him in the Johnsonian reform movement in California, Smith retorted: "I'd rather be a lamp-post on Park Row than Governor of California."

Despite these barren years, there were frequent and vivid flashes revealing deep springs of humanity and sincerity and conviction in the man, as well as a critical faculty which sometimes subjected the sham and shallowness of the organization's motives and pretensions to severe scrutiny. Moreover, in caviling at Smith's subservience to the boss, it is quite possible to overlook the fact that both Republicans and Democrats gave the people of New York about as good a brand of government as they voted for or deserved. The great body of public opinion and the voters furnished the bosses and their henchmen with little incentive for adopting the ideas advanced by sane and honest liberals. But even had Smith been conscious of a political universe which did not revolve around Tammany Hall, he would not have attempted to upset Murphy's interplanetary arrangements.

"The leader of a parade," Smith once remarked regarding the regimentals of politics, "should never get too far out in front. He might lose his gang."

Tammany, in truth, was in sore need of a leader of the parade at the moment. The golden age heralded by Murphy's 10-year record of local and State successes had shown signs of tarnishing, and there was muttering within the wigwam on Fourteenth Street. As a result of a remarkable series of disasters, there was a growing fear in Tammany that the historic institution could not long survive.

In the fall of 1914, for instance, the Democrats had lost their four-year grip on the State government through the election as governor of Charles S. Whitman, who had lost no time in capitalizing the notoriety he received as prosecutor of Police Lieutenant Becker and his gunmen pals. At Washington, where William Gibbs McAdoo was dispensing New York patronage to anti-Tammany men, the New York machine was in high disfavor.

THE BIRTH OF A NEW TAMMANY

In retrospect, it seems that from that blazing hot day at Baltimore, when impartial sunshafts shone on Bryan's bald pate, Murphy's graven visage, and Smith's flushed face, Tammany had steadily assumed the ugly aspect of a political outlaw whom anybody could shoot or slander on sight. Smith, incidentally, played a minor rôle in these organization tragedies. He was forced to sit, silent and resentful, while Bryan heaped contumely upon the man who had elevated him from a fish stall to the diamond horseshoe of politics. And though it was Murphy who cut off Sulzer's head, Smith, as majority leader of the assembly at the time, helped to give the weapon its keen edge.

It was from such travail that the modern, much-improved Tammany and the new Al Smith were born. Even Murphy could not remain unmoved by these flings of an outraged public opinion, and certain it is that the younger group in Tammany sensed the new tempora and mores. Such far-sighted leaders as Smith, Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, and Surrogate James A. Foley, who had hitherto acted merely as Murphy's agents, now became indispensable in the more important and independent rôle of advisers; and at the time of his death in 1923 the grizzled old warrior had been borne far from his ancient moorings by the tide of reform.

It is not to be supposed, however, that Smith was immediately responsive to the chastening influence of political adversity, or that these organization fatalities at once gave a new direction to his life. There was no hound of heaven chasing Al into the fold of the politically pure in heart, although there did seem to live in him some spark that stirred and glowed at the releasing of fresh social, economic, and political forces in the years following the outbreak of the World War. But a great deal more than the slaying of an underworld squealer, the impeachment of a Sulzer, and the loss of a few elections went into the shaping of the present-day Al Smith.

RESULTS OF THE TRIANGLE FIRE

Against this sinister but stimulating panorama of politics was to be projected his service as vice chairman of the legislative committee which investigated one of the most shocking holocausts that ever appalled Manhattan—the Triangle fire. Upon the individual tragedies of 146 girls, whose bodies fell in flames from the lofty stories of a factory fire trap, did the new Al Smith, phoenixlike, arise.

Smith was one of the most active members of the committee, whose methods are still a model. The group held hearings in many cities of the State, exposing to public view the dark and loathsome depths of an organized system of industrial slavery erected upon the degeneracy and degradation of the sweatshop, the employment of women and children in unhealthful surroundings, underground bakeries, canneries, and human incinerators. New York for once had a look at the raw.

From the two-year inquiry the investigators emerged with a different scale of human and political values. Smith, for one, sensed that "a State's resources are not its factories, its mountains, and its streams, but its men and women and children." Smith, moreover, came to look with new eyes upon the group of men and women who for years had cried out in vain against just such a feudal organism. These were, for the most part, men and women of the Hebrew race—men and women of ideals and intelligence. Although it had required a Triangle fire to gain them a hearing at Albany, the delay was, perhaps, worth while, for the committee prepared and had adopted a labor code which became the model for a score of States and several foreign countries.

There was, indeed, an enduring influence entering Smith's life as a result of this contact with Hebrew idealists of East Side settlement houses. It was this meeting of the representatives of two down-trodden races, both gifted with a certain genius for government, however, which has contributed most to the Smith of the last decade. The man who had formerly looked upon government as a game of politics was now brought into association with a race which has always regarded government as one of the social sciences.

During this same fruitful period Smith came under the influence of another strange brood of legendary folk, for such they must have appeared to our political realist—men who gave no ear to the boss and gazed with suspicion upon all proposals bearing the organization stamp. These were the young assemblymen and senators, captained by Franklin D. Roosevelt, who successfully resisted Murphy's efforts to impose a hand-picked candidate for the United States Senate on the legislature. They had been elected from Republican strongholds in the Democratic landslide of 1910; they had neither hope of reelection nor hostages to ransom.

So they snapped their fingers at the boss and hurled some plain truths at his legislative representative. They taunted Smith for his subservience and flung his oath of office in his face. Smith, no doubt, suffered emotions akin to those of a sophomore who learns, some starry night in a campus talk, that there are men who do not believe in God—or in his God. Smith's orderly universe was becoming chaos. Most enlightening and disillusioning of all, these young rebels won their fight on the boss.

A FIGURE OF RENOWN AND INFLUENCE

Fortunately for Smith, this period of awakening was closely followed by one of incubation. In 1915 the organization permitted him to quit Albany, and he was elected sheriff of New York County. Had he returned to the legislature, he might have remained a victim of treadmill politics; the machine's burdensome and blighting demands might have continued to fetter him. But as sheriff, and later as president of the board of aldermen, he found himself in a position to slough off some of his personal responsibility to the organization and to possess his soul. He remained a Tammany man in good standing—he always will—but with some reservations, perhaps.

The public caught its first glimpse of the changing Smith when, as a delegate to the constitutional convention of 1915, he astounded such Republican veterans and former Cabinet members as Elihu Root, George W. Wickersham, and Henry L. Stimson by his knowledge of the theory and practice of State government.

There was hardly a subject of which he was not the master, and he moved easily through the scene as a dominant figure. His Irish humor and racy anecdotes drawn from his Albany experiences illumine many of the pages which record the three months' debates and discussions. He proved a veritable child in the temple, and the sages gave him ear. Root called him "the brainiest member of the convention, remarkable and brilliant," and Wickersham said he was "the most useful." Thenceforth he was a figure of state-wide renown and influence, and he proved it almost immediately when his speaking tour about the State sent to defeat the charter he had helped to frame.

He was quickly accorded recognition for his performances on the convention floor. Republican leader writers, preachers of reform, and anti-Tammany Democrats hailed him as "a candle in a naughty Tammany world." Even Woodrow Wilson, despite his coolness to the New York organization, gave his benediction when Smith was elected governor in 1918. Writing to a friend who had expressed a fear that the new governor might not cooperate with the national administration, Wilson made this statement:

"I do not think you need have any fears for Governor Smith. He seems to me to be a man who has responded in an extraordinary manner to the awakening forces of a new day and the compulsion of changing circumstances."

A GOVERNOR FOR THE PEOPLE

Governor Smith's first message to the legislature was characterized as "bolshevik and socialistic" by Republican leaders at Albany, and so it must have seemed to them. In Smith they were to encounter a man whose legislative program was compounded of his experiences and observations on the East Side, which had become a slum district before he moved from Oliver Street to the Biltmore Hotel, of his association with idealistic social workers of the metropolis and of his Tammany instinct that "the human stuff" was good politics. All these made for a liberalism directed more to bodily betterment than to building more stately mansions for the spirit. His most radical social theory has been health and maternity insurance; his most advanced economic proposal has been that the State should delegate its right of eminent domain—the right to control private property for public purposes—and assist corporations engaged in building homes for low rentals.

In late years he has shown a great interest in political reform; his demands for modernization of the State government have antagonized such diverse elements as the Republican Old Guard and Tammany Hall ancients. For the direct primary and similar advances he is as keen as he was apathetic in his early days. Likewise, his appointments have had a nonpartisan cast—his executive secretary is a staunch Republican—and he has recognized ability and the merit system to a greater extent than his predecessors. It is, indeed, a changed Al Smith who now boasts of his success in urging the electorate to adopt constitutional amendments providing for the short ballot and consolidation of 165 departments into 18. The Smith of 1903–1915 would have bemoaned the loss of so many fat jobs for the boys; but age, ambition, and responsibility have sobered him to such a degree that he is now acclaimed as the State's foremost exponent of economy and efficiency.

Politically, his achievements are worthy of note in that he has wrested most of his program from hostile legislatures.

His appeals to the people over his opponents' heads have almost invariably resulted in their complete capitulation. His enemies, in fact, have been the architects of much of his popularity; they have frequently challenged him to battle on his most attractive proposals and provided a battle field whereon he has indeed shone as a happy warrior. His particular Goliath has been William Randolph Hearst, the millionaire publisher-politician. For more than a decade the two have been sworn foes, but the erstwhile fish boy has always emerged triumphant from their clashes. In 1922, when Hearst sought the Democratic nomination for United States Senator, Smith braved the wrath of half his party to stand astride his rival's path. Again in 1925 Smith proved the better man when he drove from the City Hall John F. Hylan, Hearst's burgomaster, only four years after "the pee-pul" had elected him by a plurality of 417,000.

BRANDED AS A "WET"

Unfortunately for Smith, his achievements as an executive and administrator have been overshadowed by the leading rôle he has occupied in the assault upon prohibition. For every voter who knows of his actual accomplishments as chief executive of the greatest State of the Union, there are probably five who know of him as the aggressive champion of the wets.

For such an attitude Smith has none but himself to blame. It was he who induced the legislature to adopt a 2.75 per cent beer bill as a test of the Volstead Act's limitation of alcoholic content to one-half of 1 per cent. Though the United States Supreme Court held this measure to be unconstitutional, Governor Smith continued to win votes on platforms favoring the return of light wines and beer. His other overt acts on behalf of the wet movement were his sponsorship of repeal of the State enforcement law and of the modification referendum that won in the 1926 election. For these things the drys will never forgive him, nor will he ask forgiveness.

Despite the dry's conception of him as a "nullificationist," he is not the extremist painted by inhabitants of the Bible belt. Never has he advocated repeal of the dry laws; he has merely urged modification of the Volstead Act within the limits of the eighteenth amendment.

In fact, his delay in signing the bill repealing the State enforcement act caused considerable concern in Tammany Hall. For one who first discerned the working man's need of a drink while lawful pails of suds swished through the East Side at the vesper hour, Al certainly gave a bad 30 days to the boys. Adopting his best judicial manner, he took the whole month allowed by law to consider his decision, gave the drys their day in his court, and then found that, "though the saloon is and ought to be a defunct institution, the definition of an intoxicating beverage in the Volstead Act is not an honest or a commonsense one." This was fairly strong stuff in 1923, when most elective officials were disposed to regard the Volstead Act as a dispensation from on high, but it was hardly the battle cry of a "nullificationist."

Of late years, it would seem, Governor Smith has placed equal stress on the necessity for enforcement. He has fathered frequent admonitions to the effect that peace officers must not consider themselves relieved of enforcement obligations because of the repeal of the State dry act. His 1927 message to the legislature was especially forceful on this point. In fact, so eloquently did Senator COPELAND elaborate on Smith's enforcement record during a Senate debate that Senator BORAH, apparently scenting some kind of tergiversation, arose to inquire if "we are now to understand that Governor Smith is in favor of prohibition."

Though Governor Smith's religion may prevent him from winning the Democratic nomination for President, as it did in 1924, those who attribute to him any of the qualities of the professional religionist misunderstand the man completely. His knowledge and acceptance of Scriptures, for instance, are almost as literal as were Bryan's, and the finely spun niceties so dear to formalists and theologians are entirely foreign to his direct and realistic nature.

It was not Smith's religion, however, so much as what he epitomized that raised up the forces of prejudice against him at Madison Square Garden. To the delegates from the South and West this easterner in the brown derby appeared as the spokesman of the masses—of tenements, of municipal machines, invading foreigners, insolent wets, liberals, clubs, and New York—all the forces deemed wicked and unholy. In their mind's eye the simple folk who burned incense and fiery crosses to Saint McAdoo saw massed behind Smith the host of visionary destroyers of all that is pure and lofty in lives led beneath fundamentalist steeples. Unfortunately for Smith and Nation, his worshipers gave substance and color to this Dantesque delusion. The Tammany camp followers, in their simple and stupid way, did irreparable damage to Smith's cause by proselyting methods which grated on the sensibilities.

THE HERO OF THE MASSES

But the wistful picture of Smith's idolaters striving so pathetically to gain an empty crown for their hero was typical of the man and his amazing appeal. He could have silenced the claque by a word, for Tammany functions like a well-drilled army, including the children of the tenements. For want of any other explanation for his failure to do so we may accept that given by his close friends. They say that he did not have the heart to stay the mob, recognizing his many debts to them, and the further fact that their affection for him is the most joyous thing in many a life otherwise drab and inarticulate.

Maybe so. In any event Smith's appeal to the masses is almost unbelievable and unexplainable. The hypothesis that they see in him the first outstanding representative of the immigrant group is interesting, but it falls far short of explaining a man who can command larger votes in many up-State communities than local candidates. It does not account for his strength among hard-headed and conservative Republican business men whose ancestors were petty officers aboard the Mayflower—a strength reckoned at 100,000 votes in New York City alone. Nor does it explain why the citizens who vote for the Hardings and Coolidges split their ballots Smithward. Originally, it would appear, his appeal was almost wholly personal and primitive, fiercely so. He came at a time when the great ones of State and Nation were aloof personalities, and there were surprise and drama in his coming. But he would have disappeared as quickly had it not been for the experience, knowledge, and skill in government he had amassed.

His staying power lies in the political characteristics which he has acquired—and used. No man in public life to-day possesses more personal charm—his enemies admit it—and his is a personality that would prove as effective in Iowa as in cosmopolitan New York.

His grin framed in the door of a hall transforms and transfigures an audience. The throng smiles, shouts madly, glows, yells, calls him by name and nickname, tries to touch him, to shake hands with him, to gain some special attention, and a large portion of it weeps from the sheer thrill of sharing in such a close-ordered demonstration of human emotion. An incident at Elmira during the 1926 campaign was typical. As "Al" came striding along the railroad platform to his car, a gray-haired brakeman in greasy clothes caught sight of his excellency in the brown derby. The railroader stopped short and his lips parted as he started to accost the guv'nor. For a moment he seemed to waver, but at last he ventured a timid and low "H'lo, Gov'nor." Smith, who was mounting the steps of his car by this time, turned, swung to the platform, and advanced, his arm outstretched and that golden grin on his lips.

"Hullo, pop," was the governor's husky-voiced greeting, "How the hell are yuh?"

As the gubernatorial train drew out some minutes later, the brakey stood there immobile, seemingly transfigured, his left hand caressing the one that had reposed in the good right hand of Al Smith.

Smith's friends insist that if he could meet and grin at every member of the electorate as he grinned at that brakey on the Elmira Railroad platform, he could be elected President—and he probably could.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, there is a very excellent editorial in this morning's Washington Post on the flood control bill. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FLOOD CONTROL BILL

The House Committee on Flood Control has reported out a bill drafted by its chairman, Mr. REID of Illinois, providing for control of the Mississippi River. The bill authorizes the Government to assume the entire expense of flood control and creates a commission to take charge of the work to consist of seven members, four of whom shall be engineers or scientists appointed by the President. The remaining three, presumably, are to be members of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army. Supervision of the work would be taken from the Chief of Engineers and placed in the commission. No specific plan is outlined by the bill. The commission to be created would be at liberty to adopt the Jadwin plan in whole or in part.

This bill meets the public demand that the Nation shall take control of this undertaking and pay the entire cost of the work. Possibly the proposed commission should be larger in order to provide representation for various necessary engineering specialties. But whether large or small the commission should be composed of civilian as well as Army engineers, and harmony between them would be promoted if a business executive of commanding ability were made chairman of the commission.

That the United States must undertake this gigantic work and pay for it is a foregone conclusion. The difficulties in the way of apportioning part of the cost to the lower Mississippi States are insuperable. No method can be found for justly apportioning their share of the cost. No State has the right to expend money for enterprises outside of its boundaries. But beyond these difficulties arises the outstanding fact that the lower Mississippi States are not responsible for the floods and should not be taxed to control them.

The Mississippi River is a national stream, draining many States and benefiting or damaging the American people, as the case may be, without regard to State lines. The lower States have already taxed themselves for scores of millions for local protection, only to be overwhelmed last year as if they had not spent a dollar. They can not control the river If the Nation is in duty bound to pay for any part of flood-control work, it is bound to pay for all of it. The river is not the property of any State or group of States. It is the property of the United States, and the owner is responsible for the damage done by his property.

General Jadwin has evolved a plan for controlling the Mississippi. Some parts of his plan are feasible and doubtless will be adopted. But he has not had time to make a survey complete enough to make it absolutely certain that his plan takes care of all the essential factors of the problem. His plan must be scrutinized and amplified by the best engineering ability at the command of the United States. In particular, the financial features of his plan must be revised if the work of controlling the Mississippi is to be finished in reasonable time. If his plan to compel States and localities to pay part of the cost should be adopted, legal and other delays will prolong the undertaking into the far future.

What the country wants is to see Uncle Sam take off his coat, roll up his sleeves, and build works to endure for all time, so that the Mississippi River shall never again inundate the valley. This is a job three times as difficult as the building of the Panama Canal, and it will cost at least twice as much.

NATIONAL PARK IN FLORIDA

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have pending in the Senate a bill providing for an investigation to determine the advisability of the location of a national park in the State of Florida. I have here expressions upon this subject from ex-Congressman Slemp and from the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] expressions recently uttered by them in my State. I desire to have them printed in the RECORD, if I may have unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times, December 21, 1927]

SLEMP PREDICTS GREAT TOURIST PARK FOR STATE—VISITOR TO CITY ADVOCATES PROJECT TO BENEFIT ALL FLORIDA

Establishment of a national park of 200,000 acres or more in the southern part of the State, as Florida's best means of drawing tourists, was advocated Tuesday night by C. Bascom Slemp, former Congressman and secretary to President Coolidge, who arrived here during the day for a visit of two weeks as guest of Frank Dodge, manager of the Soreno Hotel.

Mr. Slemp held that the establishment of such a park would be of greater benefit to Florida than overdevelopment of the State's agricultural resources. He explained that this park could be set aside for the protection and propagation of animals and game native to the subtropical climate, which he declared was the only such tropical area in the United States.

"Congress has just established two great national parks," Mr. Slemp said, "one in the Great Smoky Mountains of Tennessee and the other in the Shenandoah Valley. There is no reason why such a park should not be established in Florida and I believe you will find favorable reaction in Congress to such a project.

"Every hotel and business man in the State would be interested, and it is something for the public-spirited men of Florida to work for.

"I would suggest the lower part of Florida far enough south to find the royal palm in its native state. Here the animal and bird life, flowers, trees, and plants could be grown. Tropical plants could be imported and propagated under natural conditions, making an attraction which would draw tourists from all sections of the world.

"The project would probably involve the National Government draining a section of the Everglades, building lodges, refuges for the animals and birds, and constructing good roads to all parts of the park, similar to the great parks of the West.

* * * * * * *

Senator GILLETT was asked for an expression on the proposition of J. Bascom Slemp, made two days ago, advocating the establishment in Florida of a large national park, the 200,000 acres of which would provide a great winter contrast in palms, flowers, birds of gay plumage, and many rare animals of the sub-Tropics. The visiting Senator said:

"That would be a fine thing indeed. It would supply in the only semitropic State of the country a great resort and preserve to match the beauties and grandeur of Yellowstone Park. Here in Florida it would be within short motor-car distance of the big population in the Eastern and Central States."

Senator GILLETT asked if the proposition had gone far enough to suggest in what part of Florida the proposed park might be located.

During the day Senator GILLETT played on the Lakewood estate golf links. He is stopping at the Soreno Hotel.

PRINTING OF SURVEY OF DISTRICT PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, from the Committee on Printing I report back favorably Senate Resolution 144, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration, as there is considerable necessity for haste. I ask that the clerk may read the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 144) submitted by Mr. PHIPPS on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript of the report of a survey of the public schools of the District of Columbia, transmitted by the United States Bureau of Efficiency to Senator LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS, chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Appropriations for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, be printed with illustrations as a Senate document.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I hope that unanimous consent will be given for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

RECENT DECISIONS OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Mr. NEELY. I ask unanimous consent to have read from the Secretary's desk about three paragraphs from Cushing's Survey, entitled "Setting them straight."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SETTING THEM STRAIGHT

The Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate will begin on Friday a hearing on coal-mine labor. It will spend a day in an effort to decide whether later it will conduct a thorough investigation. The committee expects to report in favor of such a hearing.

On February 23 the same committee expects to hold a hearing on the confirmation of the appointment of John J. Esch to a membership on the Interstate Commerce Commission. The two matters are sure to be tied together, because Senator REED of Pennsylvania has amended the labor resolution by demanding an inquiry as to whether rates are fair and whether any coal field has been developed prematurely under them.

The Government hired Mr. Esch to do a job—to decide when and what rates are reasonable. Mr. Esch and the whole commission decided to do another job—to modify competition among shippers. The shipping public and the carriers object to such action and either want the whole commission "fired" or put back "in their places."

The biggest subject before the Senate committee is whether Mr. Esch is to get his job. He will not be tried on his record. That is good enough. No one questions it. That is, Mr. Esch's brilliancy would never set the world afire; still, he is no dullard. He is patient, plodding, honest, and straightforward—a first-rate example of that average ability which makes up the rank and file of those who live by politics. Therefore the objection to Mr. Esch has nothing whatever to do with Mr. Esch in person; it concerns itself almost solely with the commission's attitude toward business as a whole. What the Senate committee is about to investigate is not the personal record of the President's appointee but the mental twist of the commission to which he has been appointed. This is an investigation of the Commerce Commission over the unoffending and unimportant shoulders of Mr. Esch. And if you want to know what that is all about, you might read—or try to read—a recent editorial in the Saturday Evening Post.

In a recent issue it prints a two-column editorial on the subject. As is its custom, it starts this editorial off with a brief history of the world, followed by a succinct résumé of ancient and modern philosophy. At the end of a tedious prelude, it gets to the point, namely: The commission was appointed to say when rates are reasonable, to the end that commerce may move and the railroads remain prosperous. Lately the commission has assumed that its mission is to equalize prosperity among the shippers. The Saturday Evening Post holds that the commission is not and never was designed to be the guardian of sectional prosperity. That is outside its line—is none of its business.

The Virginia Legislature passed, on February 3, a resolution which goes much further. It says that whereas the Constitution declares positively against impost duties—that is, against any tax upon commerce moving from one State to another—the commission has gone infinitely further, and has, by rate regulation, embargoed the commerce of Virginia and near-by States in certain markets for the purpose of favoring shippers in others States. The Saturday Evening Post makes the same point. It says that the commission has tried by rate regulation to tear down the fruit business of one section and to build up the fruit business of another section.

It happens that Mr. Esch, when a member of the commission, voted that policy into effect. He has now been renominated. The Senate is holding up his confirmation until it can determine whether the commission is doing its real job and what sort of notions that body has adopted. One man expressed the whole situation here recently when he said:

"Association secretaries frequently forget who they are working for and want to run the business of their employers; they must be set straight. The commission is now in the same frame of mind and must be told where it gets off."

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, the article just read I had not seen, but it is an appropriate prelude to the remarks I intend to make.

A few days ago the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] introduced, and the Senate adopted, a resolution touching this same subject matter. I assure the Senate that I would not take the time to discuss at length this subject if I did not believe it to be one of the most important now before the American people; and I venture the opinion in the outset that when Congress comes fully to apprehend what has been done and what is being done, not only a resolution will be found necessary but positive legislation. If I may have the patience of the Senate, I shall try, in a condensed form, to lay the facts before the Senate, not claiming the right of any original discoverer, for the question has been discussed in many places, has been acted upon by the Legislature of Virginia, and is known to many people; and yet I do not think there has been a concise statement covering the entire question made on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, in the inception of what I am about to say, I want it understood that I am not making a general assault upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has numbered among its members many men of distinction, of the highest rectitude, and of a splendid order of integrity. However, a recent decision of the commission is, in my judgment, so revolutionary as to demand the attention of Congress. To that decision I respectfully invite your consideration.

The interstate commerce act, passed originally in 1887, was enacted to meet conditions which had then developed. At that time railroads arbitrarily fixed their charges without much regard to the cost of transportation. A rule commonly enforced was "to charge all the traffic will bear." Very frequently rate wars occurred, with disastrous results to the carriers and, generally, with injury to the shipping public.

One of the evils against which there was persistent protest was the adjustment of freight rates so as to destroy the natural advantages of a city or territory in order to benefit a community not so favorably situated. It frequently happened that enterprises having an established trade within the region naturally tributary found themselves bankrupt or compelled to move elsewhere by an arbitrary and unjust change in freight rates. Likewise, there was discrimination between companies and individuals of the same locality. Secret rebates were allowed so that favored shippers were able to destroy their business rivals. Congressional investigations demonstrated that certain great organizations, notably the Steel Trust and the Standard Oil Co., owed a large measure of their success to rebates and concessions either secretly or openly granted.

To remedy these evils the interstate commerce act was passed and the Interstate Commerce Commission was created. I desire to emphasize the fact that one of the chief evils intended to be prevented was the manipulation of rates so as to destroy the natural advantages of a community or to wreck an established business.

The Interstate Commerce Commission was to be a semijudicial body to guard against all of the evils to which I have adverted. The singular and startling irony of fate is that after 40 years of effort and litigation the commission has not only solemnly approved but has directly ordered and is directly responsible for the return of the chief of these evils, namely, it has rendered a decision the effect of which is to place a burden upon the producers of one section of the country for the express purpose of aiding the producers of another section. The action taken is the negation of the very purpose of the law. Moreover, if it is permitted to stand, then the commission possesses the authority to annul natural advantages of a State, city, or community; take away from them their trade territory; destroy investments honestly and prudently made upon the strength of natural conditions, and substitute for these advantages its arbitrary mandate.

If the power thus asserted can be maintained, it is greater than that possessed by any legislative body or any court, for no legislative body or court can deprive a citizen of his property without due process of law, whilst the commission may by a simple order destroy the property of many great enterprises and ruin the prospects of great cities and vast communities.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment? Will it interrupt the thread of his argument?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I would prefer, if the Senator please, if he would withhold any interrogation, because I may answer in a moment what he is going to say.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly; I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The fact that this destruction operates indirectly and may, therefore, not be strictly violative of the provisions of the Constitution, in no manner militates against the wrongful character of the act.

The decision rendered, in my judgment, is violative of the spirit of the interstate commerce act itself.

That act was intended to establish just and reasonable rates between all points; and the term "just and reasonable rates" as applied to railroads has always been held to mean rates which will produce for the carrier only a fair return upon the capital invested.

The Interstate Commerce Commission in the case I am considering has ordered certain railroads not to reduce their rates, although the roads contend that the reduced rate would be fully compensatory. Thus the Interstate Commerce Commission orders the carriers to do the very thing which the law was intended to prevent.

It is my purpose to employ the language of moderation. Yet I feel compelled to say that the decision rendered was not only revolutionary and unjust, but that it is probably the most arbitrary yet handed down by any Federal board or tribunal.

With all due respect to the commission, it seems to me that the decision is a distinct and unwarranted usurpation of power.

Besides, the decision was rendered under such conditions as to cast a cloud upon it and upon those who are chiefly responsible for it.

To understand the decision, a brief word of explanation is necessary.

There are two deposits of bituminous coal in the United States which by reason of the superiority of the coal and the facility with which it may be mined and marketed possess a great advantage in the market, and are in distinct rivalry:

First. The Ohio No. 8, Pittsburgh, and Cambridge districts, located in the State of Pennsylvania and in eastern Ohio. For convenience I shall hereafter refer to this district as the Pittsburgh district.

Second. The Kentucky, Tennessee, West Virginia, and Virginia coal fields.

These coal fields, for the purpose of rate making, are divided into (a) the Kanawha and Thacker districts of West Virginia, and (b) the other coal fields of West Virginia and the coal fields of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia, hereafter called the Kentucky-West Virginia district.

A glance at the map will show that the Pittsburgh district has its natural trade territory and certain natural advantages:

First. It is not far removed from Lake Erie, which, in turn, gives it water transportation through all the Great Lakes and throughout that country which is tributary thereto. It enjoys a distinct advantage throughout all of the New England States, including New York and the eastern seaboard States, and as far south as Maryland. It also enjoys the advantage of a westward haul so far as natural proximity makes that haul feasible. That is its natural trade territory, and such are its natural advantages.

Second. The Kentucky-West Virginia district is farther removed from Lake Erie than the Pittsburgh district. Nevertheless, it is so located as to enjoy the benefit of rail connection with the Great Lakes, with whatever advantages accrue through that outlet. In addition to this, it is farther west and south than the Pittsburgh district, and has a natural territory to the west and southwest. But these latter advantages are limited because of the great deposits of coal in Illinois and in other States to the west. Hence, its chief outlets for distribution are to points upon the Atlantic coast and to points reached by the joint rail-and-water haul through the Great Lakes.

If I may pause here, if you will imagine this country with Pennsylvania lying well to the east and northeast and in close proximity to the Lakes, and then imagine the Tennessee, Kentucky, West Virginia, and Virginia districts lying farther from the Lakes, yet each of these fields finding it necessary to reach the Lakes in order that they may market their coals through all the vast territory tributary to the Lakes—if you will get that in your minds, you will have the outlines of the picture.

Mr. President, it would seem too plain for argument (a) that as a matter of justice between these two coal fields each should be allowed to enjoy the natural advantages of its location, and should be permitted to engage in fair and free competition for business wheresoever that competition would naturally spring up.

(b) That the consuming public is entitled to purchase its coals in the open market as cheaply as the coals may be produced and shipped; and that this right should not be lessened by combinations between the coal fields or their companies. Neither should it be lessened by any act of any public board, the effect of which is to increase the price paid by the ultimate consumer.

It is not open to dispute that if the operators of these rival coal fields were to combine so that one of them were permitted to enjoy a monopoly in a certain district, and the other to enjoy a corresponding monopoly in some other district, and the consumers were thus by combination to be deprived of the benefits of competition, protest would at once be made, and it would be demanded that those engaging in such combinations should be punished for a conspiracy in restraint of trade.

Nevertheless, as I shall attempt to show, the Interstate Commerce Commission by its order has accomplished exactly the same result as might have been produced by a criminal conspiracy in restraint of trade.

Further, I shall show that the result of the order of the commission is to place an artificial burden upon the people of a vast portion of the United States, and that this result was accomplished by the order of the commission refusing to permit the carriers from the West Virginia-Kentucky district to reduce the rates on coal hauled from these fields to the Great Lakes.

The order of the commission refusing to allow the railroads to reduce their rates was made against the earnest protest of the carrier companies, which not only stood ready to reduce their rates but insisted that the rates were fully compensatory.

This startling decision demands the attention of Congress.

In order to understand the effect of the last decision it is necessary to give the historical background.

Prior to 1912 the railway companies operating from these two respective fields established their rates with a view to the promotion of the interests of the railroads and the gaining of a reasonable compensation for the service rendered.

There never was a time when the railroads were in competition for the same coal. The lines were hundreds of miles apart. Each was engaged in the business of hauling the coal from the fields reached by the respective lines.

The carrier companies, therefore, had only their own interests to conserve, and naturally fixed their rates so that the producers could afford to mine and market their coals, for otherwise the railroads would have had no coal to transport.

At the time referred to, when there was unrestricted competition, when there was no interference by the Interstate Commerce Commission, when the railroads were conducting their own business and fixing their own charges according to the service rendered, these were the facts:

The rate from the Pennsylvania district to the Great Lakes was 9 cents a ton less than the rate from the Kanawha and Thacker districts of West Virginia and 24 cents a ton less than from the West Virginia-Kentucky districts on lake cargo coal. That is, because of their proximity to the Lakes, because of their natural advantages, the coal producers of those regions could get their coal to market at from 9 to 24 cents a ton less than the West Virginia-Kentucky producers could.

To state that again, that is to say, the coal producers of the Kanawha and Thacker districts were compelled to pay 9 cents more to haul their coal to the Great Lakes than were the producers of the Pennsylvania districts, and the coal producers of the West Virginia-Kentucky districts were compelled to pay for the same haul 24 cents a ton more than was paid by the producers of the Pittsburgh district. That was the situation when business principles regulated the rates.

It is a matter of history and general knowledge that the coal fields of Pennsylvania were first developed and had every advantage incident to primary occupancy of the coal market. About 1912, however, the West Virginia-Kentucky fields had become an active rival for the lake trade. This had been largely accomplished by the introduction of modern machinery, modern economies, and improved business methods.

The Pittsburgh operators were unwilling to meet their new rival in the open market and compete for business. They desired the aid of a Federal tribunal.

Accordingly in 1912 they came before the Interstate Commerce Commission asking for readjustment of rates.

They were successful. The 9-cent differential was increased to 19 cents and the 24-cent differential was increased to 34 cents.

In plain language, they were given by the decision of the commission an additional advantage of 10 cents a ton in freight rates.

They hoped by this means to cripple their rivals. But it is to be noted that this increase in the differential was accomplished by ordering the railroads to lower their rates from the Pittsburgh district to the Great Lakes. There was no increase of rates anywhere. Consequently, the order of the commission was at least in the interest of the public consumer, and I do not claim that it was not justly made, because it must be presumed that the rates which were being charged from the Pittsburgh district were too high.

It is to be noted, however, when the Interstate Commerce Commission made the order reducing the rates from the Pittsburgh district it evidently did not concern itself with the consideration that such reduction might be to the disadvantage of the West Virginia-Kentucky mines. That, I think, was the sound view.

So stood the case until 1917. We were then in the war. Prices of all kinds were advancing. The Interstate Commerce Commission on this occasion advanced the rates from both fields, but it is to be noticed that at the same time it increased the differential against the Kanawha and Thacker districts from 19 to 25 cents, and against the other southern West Virginia-Kentucky and Tennessee and Virginia districts from 34 to 40 cents.

Again, I do not pause to discuss the merits of this action other than to say that it was again to the disadvantage of the West Virginia-Kentucky fields. What influences were then at work I do not undertake to say, but recent events warrant the suspicion that the Pennsylvania producers were not "asleep at the switch."

Notwithstanding this enormous differential, the West Virginia-Kentucky districts continued to do business. They met adverse railroad rates by further economies; by the introduction of more improved machinery and by good business management, so that in the face of the adverse action of the Government their business continued to expand and progressively attained a greater proportion of the lake cargo trade, which, being translated into other language, means that they were better supplying the vast army of customers who were tributary to the Great Lakes region.

The fact is they cleaned and screened their coal better; shipped it in more merchantable sizes, free from slate and other impurities, and by sheer business ability gained an increased patronage. This is shown by the fact that under the 9-cent differential Pittsburgh had 70.25 per cent of all the lake cargo trade. Under the 19-cent minimum differential its business had dropped to 58.94 per cent, and under the 25-cent differential it had dropped to 28.41 per cent. Evidently something had to be done. Arbitrary action was demanded.

Accordingly the Pittsburgh producers came before the Interstate Commerce Commission and demanded the establishment of a higher differential. In plain language the demand amounted to this: That the Interstate Commerce Commission should relieve them from competition with the West Virginia-Kentucky coals by increasing the railroad differential so as to hamper, limit, and exclude the West Virginia-Kentucky mines from all or a large part of the market. Such was the plain and, indeed, the avowed purpose of the Pittsburgh operators.

It is to be noted that the railroads did not appear and ask for any change in their rates. Also, it is to be noted that the producers of Pennsylvania were not there demanding that an order be made lowering the rates from their fields.

What they were demanding was a readjustment of rates so that they would have the advantage of a differential of over 50 cents per ton. That is to say, they insisted that the differential against the Kanawha and Thacker district should be put above 50 cents and the differential from the other West Virginia-Kentucky districts should be increased accordingly.

Their purpose is not a matter of doubt. It was to exclude the West Virginia-Kentucky coals from the lake cargo trade.

The principal witness for the Pittsburgh operators testified:

> We will be benefited to the extent we can keep them—that is, the West Virginia-Kentucky coals—out. If we can get these differentials, we can undoubtedly keep them out to an extent. It will be merely a question of confining their growth as closely as we can.

Thus it appears that these Pennsylvania operators demanded that the Government of the United States should destroy a legitimate competition; should enable them to exercise a partial or complete monopoly within a great portion of the United States; and that this should be done at the expense of the consuming public.

A proposition more unjustifiable, more at war with the theory of the antitrust acts, has not to my knowledge been heretofore advanced.

The case came before the Interstate Commerce Commission, then composed of Campbell, Hall, Meyer, Esch, Aitchison, Woodlock, Cox, Eastman, McManamy, Lewis, and McChord. It was fought out for weeks and months. It was argued from every angle and presented in every aspect.

It will be noted and can not be too much emphasized that the Pittsburgh operators were not stressing the claim that the rates from their mines to the Lakes were too high. What they were interested in was that the differential should be expanded so that they would have the advantage over their competitors.

The case was taken under consideration for months, and on the 16th day of July, 1925, the Interstate Commerce Commission handed down its decision. The majority of the commission decided that upon the entire record the then existing rates from the Pittsburgh, Kentucky, and West Virginia districts were not unduly prejudicial, unduly preferential, or otherwise unlawful. The opinion, delivered by Commissioner Hall, discusses the entire controversy in a learned and logical manner, and that opinion was concurred in by Commissioner Esch.

Commissioner Eastman dissented upon the ground, not that the rates from the West Virginia-Kentucky district should be raised, but that the rates from the Pittsburgh district should be lowered; and he took pains to say that this did not prevent the railroads from transporting coal from the West Virginia-Kentucky regions making a corresponding reduction. That is to say, this commissioner at this time was in favor of allowing a reduction in rates by all carriers. But he does not hint at raising of rates and increasing the burden upon the people, but rather in advance protests against such action. In that opinion Commissioner McManamy concurred.

It thus appears that 6 of the 11 commissioners held absolutely that there should be no change in the situation, incontinently turned their backs upon the application of the Pittsburgh operators, and refused to become parties to their scheme to throttle the commerce of their rivals.

Such was the situation when this semijudicial body proceeded upon the law and the evidence of the case. Then it was the political battalion was called into action. The old guard was summoned to battle. The Senator from Pennsylvania, being in command, possessed the advantage of long experience and intimate association with the Secretary of the Treasury. The decision was rendered July 16, 1925. Petitions for rehearing were filed and were pending.

On March 6, 1926, the able Senator from Pennsylvania addressed his cohorts at a banquet at the Fayette-Green County Coal Producers' Association held at the White Swan Hotel, Uniontown, Pa. He declared:

> Now, what are we going to do about it? Of course, we are going to demand our rights, but we are not going to stop at that. We are not only going to demand them but we are going to fight for them, and fighting for them means that we are going to keep at it until we have fair representation and until that fair representation has yielded a correction of these conditions of which we complain.

Fair representation where? Upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. Fair representation in the sense that they proposed to put upon the Interstate Commerce Commission men who will reverse the decision rendered and decide the case in favor of Pennsylvania. Fair representation in the same sense that a doctrine established by the Supreme Court of the United States might be reversed by packing the Supreme Court with men who would not decide according to the law and the fact but according to the interest of a particular litigant. Fair representation in the sense that by changing the personnel of the commission or by coercing the commission the kind of decision could be obtained that the coal operators of Pennsylvania wanted. It is a pitiable example of the submergence of ethics by financial interest.

What was the first step taken? Having lost the case upon its merits before the court, it was now determined to change the personnel of the court. The Senator from Pennsylvania suddenly appeared in the light of an insurgent. A vacancy had occurred on the commission through the expiration of the term of Commissioner Potter, and the President had appointed to fill this vacancy Thomas F. Woodlock. Senator REED opposed the confirmation of Woodlock. The reasons for that opposition appear in an interview of December 1, 1926, in the Pittsburgh Gazette-Times. From the interview it appears that the Senator from Pennsylvania visited the President and discussed the Woodlock appointment, and that he was then given to understand that if he would support Woodlock or withdraw his opposition the next appointment would go to Pennsylvania.

The article is as follows:

> Senator REED declared that he would not vote for the confirmation of Woodlock until given assurance that the claim of Pennsylvania would be considered in filling future vacancies on the commission. White House intentions to consider for future appointment a member familiar with Pennsylvania industry and transportation were satisfactory to Senator REED and he voted for the confirmation of Commissioner Woodlock. The approaching vacancy is the first to occur since.
>
> Senator REED conferred with President Coolidge at the White House last Wednesday, and it is understood that the main subject of discussion was the prospective appointment to the vacancy. Senator REED has declined to discuss the matter and has in no way indicated whom he will recommend for the appointment.
> Regardless of whether a new commissioner would have a vote on the case, the failure to reappoint Commissioner Cox would remove from the commission a member who cast his vote against the claims of the Pittsburgh district at the former hearing of the case, when 6 negative votes of the 11 members of the commission decided the case against Pittsburgh's demand for a fair readjustment of the rates.

Time ran on, but it did not run very long until the articles of the treaty of peace between the Senator from Pennsylvania and the President were put in force.

The term of Commissioner Cox, one of the commissioners who had concurred in the majority opinion, was about to expire. He had been a good commissioner. So far as I know, neither his ability nor fidelity had ever been questioned.

But Pennsylvania had to be taken care of. Accordingly the Senator from Pennsylvania recommended Cyrus E. Woods, who was certainly "familiar with Pennsylvania industry and transportation." Likewise he will be remembered as the gentleman who was brought in to compose the discordant elements of Pennsylvania who were then organizing for action in the great slush-fund campaign. He had also been connected with the coal industry both as attorney and stockholder.

Everything was progressing smoothly, and Pennsylvania was about to get a man on the commission in place of Cox, who had voted against the raising of the differential. But Senator PITTMAN exposed the scheme and put in the RECORD the interview I have just presented. The hurdle thus erected was a little bit too high for the Pennsylvania horse to take. Wood was rejected.

Under the circumstances, it would not have been wise to have just then and there appointed another man like Wood, so Mr. Brainerd was appointed to fill the seat made vacant by Cox. And be it said to Brainerd's credit, he did not undertake to participate in the decision on rehearing. But, nevertheless, the removal of Cox had removed one of the obstacles to the reversal of the case.

The term of Commissioner Esch was about to expire. His emoluments and honors were, of course, dependent upon reappointment. He must have known of the threat of Senator REED that Pennsylvania proposed to be represented. He had doubtless observed that the Senator from Pennsylvania had climbed to the very apex of political power and influence. I doubt not that the commissioner often viewed with disconsolate eyes Cox's scalp already suspended from the pole of the Reed tepee. He naturally desired to avoid a similar fate.

The 1925 decision was concurred in by Commissioners Hall, Esch, Aitchison, Meyer, Cox, and Woodlock. Cox had been removed. And upon rehearing, although the case had been fully tried in the first instance and there had been no change in the conditions, Esch and Aitchison changed their votes and rendered a decision fixing the differential at the point demanded by the Pennsylvania interests.

The decision on rehearing is exactly the opposite of the decision first rendered, except in one respect. In the original decision the commission held the railroad rates from both fields to be reasonable and refused to change them by raising the rate from the West Virginia-Kentucky district. In the second opinion they held the rate from Pennsylvania district to be excessive and lowered that rate, thus giving to the Pennsylvania fields the full advantage they had originally demanded.

If the decision had stopped at that point it might be said that even if it established a differential which was unfair to the Kentucky-West Virginia fields, still it would give cheaper coal to the consumers because of the cheaper railroad rate from the Pennsylvania fields, and the carriers from the West Virginia-Kentucky fields could, if they saw fit, reduce their rates and thus all the coal consumers would retain the benefit of competition between the two coal fields and receive their coal cheaper because of lowered railroad charges.

But the commission did not propose to permit anything of the kind. It manifestly was determined to give an advantage to the Pennsylvania fields by granting a differential so great as to deprive the Kentucky-West Virginia fields of the opportunity theretofore existing of marketing their coals.

Having lowered the rate from the Pennsylvania fields, the commission now did the extraordinary thing of warning the carriers of the West Virginia-Kentucky fields that they must not lower their rates to correspond with the reduced rates of the Pennsylvania fields.

It should be borne in mind that that question was not before the commission. The question there was the establishment of a differential. The commission, therefore, was without power, right, or authority to make a decision commanding the carriers from the West Virginia-Kentucky districts not to lower their rates. Nevertheless it had the temerity to warn these carriers that they must not reduce their rates. It was an arrogant and unwarranted command issued by a board, such a command as might have been issued by a despot who is the sole source of all law and can promulgate it whenever he sees fit.

The commission had the temerity to warn these carriers, I say, that they must not reduce their rates. This is what the commission said:

Under the issues now presented, it is unnecessary for us to consider whether the rates from the southern districts are lower than reasonable minima, but we are of the opinion that the carriers would not be justified in reducing the present rates from those districts (p. 365).

That was a question not before them and not considered by them, according to their own language, yet they issued this edict in advance, commanding or warning those roads not to dare to reduce their rates. This wholly unjustifiable and outrageous warning was issued with reference to a matter not before the court.

It is properly characterized by Commissioner Hall in his dissenting opinion. He said:

As to the other districts, which chance to be for the most part south of the Ohio River, no finding is made, but the opinion is expressed that the carriers serving them would not be justified in reducing the present rates from those districts. Whether this be monitory or minatory it goes outside the findings and prejudges issues which may hereafter come before us for determination in the manner contemplated by law. The query must follow: What right have we to invade the domain which the law has allotted to carrier management and to seek by hint, suggestion, warning, or threat to coerce carriers into a course of action other than that which they have chosen or may choose to take? The essence of the transportation act is regulation and not management. That act was not a general reform act, giving us powers to redistribute the business or the wealth of individuals or of producing regions in accordance with whatever social, economic, or sectional views might at a given time command a majority of votes in this commission. These admonitions, or foreshadowings, or requirements, whatever they may be called, would seem to be prompted by a desire to afford a relief which can not be afforded upon the record made and to result from the impulse which prompted the majority "in considering whether the rates (from the complaining districts) may be reduced to relate them more fairly to those from the southern districts" (p. 390).

At another place, in a terse sentence, Commissioner Hall sums the whole case up as follows:

Congress has not made of us a special providence (p. 386).

Now, what followed? The carriers from the Kentucky-West Virginia districts saw fit to disregard this peremptory warning of the commission, doubtless regarding it as made without authority of law, as contrary to sound reason, and as in direct opposition to the purpose of the interstate commerce act.

These carriers undoubtedly knew that if the rates were not reduced from these districts the producers would be unable to market their coal and the business of the railroads would correspondingly suffer. Accordingly, these carriers reduced the rates so as to correspond to the lowering of the Pennsylvania rates. And thereupon the commission issued an order suspending the reduced rates. This was in effect an injunction issued against the railroads reducing the rates.

The railroads are now before the commission insisting that they had the right to make the reduced rates; insisting that it was satisfactory to the railroads; insisting it was fully compensatory, and the commission is in the position of suspending the rate and enjoining the railroads from making a reduction which would be highly beneficial to all of the consumers of lake cargo coal.

So that I return to the statement originally made, that whereas the purpose of the interstate commerce act was to produce lower and more equitable rates to the shippers of the United States and to all of the people, and to prevent combinations and conspiracies between the railroads for the purpose of advancing rates, the effect of the decision thus rendered is to produce the same result which might be brought about by an unlawful conspiracy between the railroads.

But there is another view which to my mind is even more appalling. We find that a commission set up for one purpose is now exercising its powers for a different purpose. It is assuming the right to fix railroad rates, not upon the basis of the cost of transportation, but it proposes to lower or raise rates for the benefit of a particular locality to the detriment of an established business and the rights of another locality.

If that power exists in the Interstate Commerce Commission, then I repeat it is a power greater than is possessed by any other department of the Government. Congress would not be justified in passing a rate bill which had for its avowed purpose the building up of one city and the tearing down of another; and if such purpose were written on the face of the law, courts would be certain to overturn the statute as unreasonable.

The power now usurped by the Interstate Commerce Commission is a greater and more destructive power than has ever been undertaken under any constitutional government to my knowledge.

If the power exists the commission can, for the express purpose of building up Chicago, command the railroads to raise the St. Louis rates, or for the purpose of building up St. Louis, command the railroads so to fix their rates that St. Louis can ship into Chicago's natural territory and take from Chicago her natural advantages of position. And what is true of those two cities, of course, is true of all other cities of the United States, and is true of all sections.

The arbitrary power could be employed so as to destroy the industries of vast sections of the United States. If this power exists, then six men sitting as commissioners might build up the eastern and western sections of the country at the expense of the great interior. Or they might build up the great interior at the expense of the coast States. Such a power is too great and too dangerous to be held by any body of men in a free country. But if such a power exists, or is asserted, then it becomes perfectly manifest that this great semijudicial board will speedily degenerate into a mere political organization for the control of which various sections of the country will be in active contest; other States will be heard saying, "We have got a right to be represented by somebody who is going to vote the way we want him to vote"; so that in the end we shall have a political body; the section that can muster the most votes will control that body, and the powers of the Government will be employed to destroy one part of the country and to build up another part.

The example of Pennsylvania in endeavoring to pack the board and then insisting upon a direct representation thereon in order that Pennsylvania's interest may be especially looked after will be followed in other parts of the country. Such a condition means the destruction of the usefulness of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such a policy can no more be justified when applied to the commission than a similar policy could be justified if applied to the Supreme Court itself. Although, of course, the latter body is much the greater and more important, nevertheless the principle is the same.

Mr. President, it is indeed regrettable that it is hard to escape the conclusion that the Interstate Commerce Commission reversed itself because it sat under the shadow of the suspended sword of Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, my task is somewhat difficult, because I am not permitted by the Senate to have a colleague, and I have to try alone to answer the arguments of eight Senators from the four Southern States which compete with us and with their new ally in this warfare, who has just finished speaking. Of the skill and eloquence of that ally whom they have acquired no one can complain; he is matchless in the Senate; but unhappily in this case the alliance is so new that he has not yet learned some of the facts that always turn up to embarrass those who try to denounce Pennsylvania on this ground as on so many others.

For one thing, the decision of which the Senator from Missouri complains did not give Pennsylvania all that she demanded, as he so forcefully said. It gave Pennsylvania 20 cents reduction in the rate from Pittsburgh to the Lakes, whereas she had asked, and to us it seemed that she had proved the propriety of, a 42-cent reduction. Pennsylvania in that decision got less than half what she asked.

Furthermore, if that decision is unjust or if the later refusal to permit a reduction by the southern roads is unjust, an appeal lies to the court, where it can be considered more temperately than it can be considered here in the Senate. Their right to an appeal is obvious. No doubt they have already taken it; I am not familiar with that. If they have, the question will be determined judicially and not politically.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania pardon an interruption?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not intend again to interrupt.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not mind the Senator from Missouri interrupting me.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If such an appeal is taken, about how long does the Senator think it would take to have it decided?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am sure I do not know.

Mr. REED of Missouri. A couple of years would be a short time, would it not?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It would take about as long as it has taken us to have decided the other cases against us where we took appeals.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes; and during those two years or more these rates would remain in effect and the mandate of the commission against the reduction of rates from the West Virginia field would remain unchanged.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I did not hear the Senator; I am sorry.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I say, during all that period these rates would remain in effect.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. They would unless they were suspended pending the appeal.

The Senator from Missouri also, perhaps, has not had called to his attention just what are these rates and what is this question about which there is so much excitement in two of the States. I wonder if the Senator realizes what is the situation, or what was the situation until that last order of the commission. I am not going to quote many figures, but I beg the Senate to listen to these:

It is 163 miles from Pittsburgh to the nearest lake port; it is 463 miles from Harlan, Ky., to the Lake ports. The rate on Pittsburgh coal for 163 miles was $1.66, more than 1 cent a mile, per ton; the rate from Harlan, Ky., was $1.91 for 463 miles. Now, let us see what that means. That means that if each shipping point pays $1.66 for the first 163 miles of carriage, then the shippers in Harlan, Ky., are getting 300 miles of transportation for 25 cents. Does that call for correction or not? Is Pennsylvania corrupt because she objects to that situation?

Now, let us turn in the other direction and face eastward. It is 415 miles from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia. Eastbound coal from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia pays $2.72 a ton. It is 612 miles from the Kentucky mines to Hampton Roads, the competing point. They get the first 415 miles of that trip for $2.72, just what Pittsburgh pays, and they get the last 196 miles for nothing whatsoever. Their coal is hauled 196 miles for nothing in order that they may compete with us.

Let us take another case: If we ship to New York Harbor to sell our coal for bunker coal in the steamers there or for export or for coastwise shipment from New York, we pay $3.19 for 500 miles, less one-fifth of a mile—to be exact, the distance is 499.8 miles—but if coal from Kentucky is shipped to Hampton Roads it is carried 612 miles for $2.72; in other words, the Kentucky coal gets a haul 120 miles longer than ours for 47 cents less than we pay. Is Pennsylvania corrupt because she protests such unfairness as that; and if I rise in the Senate, as I have done, and say that any such system is indefensible from any standpoint, is that because Mr. Mellon is a friend of mine, which the Senator from Missouri thinks to be such a critical circumstance in this matter? Does not the Senator realize that the speech he has just made is in defense of such injustices as that because of which Kentucky coal gets a long haul for less money than Pittsburgh has to pay for the shorter haul?

I do not mean to intimate that we are competent here to pass judgment on these rates; I am merely giving these as instances to show that the producers in Pennsylvania have some justice on their side and that they are not reeking with a corrupt desire to steal the business that belongs to some one else. We may be Republicans, it is true—most of us are—but we still have a few rights, although we have no right to be represented in the Senate by our constitutional quota of Senators, and we have no right to be represented on the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I wonder if Senators realize what the situation is there. That commission was created in 1887, 41 years ago, and it has 11 members. Pennsylvania originates one-sixth of all the freight traffic of this Nation of ours and it has almost one-tenth of the population—more than one-eleventh—but, although it has that great proportion of the population, although it originates one-sixth of all the railway traffic of this Nation, it has never in the 41 years of that commission's existence for one moment had a single member among the 11 members of the commission. Is that justice?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, does not the Senator know that 14 States of this Union, constituting in area at least one-third of the Nation, have had no representative on the Interstate Commerce Commission until very recently?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Until very recently!

Mr. GLASS. Until Colonel Taylor, of Alabama, was made a member of the commission.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And Pennsylvania has never had any member on it, not even recently.

Mr. GLASS. Colonel Taylor, by the way, concurred in the opinion which the Senator now so highly commends.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it does seem to me that a State of one-tenth the population that can develop its industries until it produces one-sixth of all the products of this country has been treated very graciously and generously, and has no right to complain of the commission.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is the way the Senator looks at it.

Mr. SWANSON. Is not that true? The Senator's own statement shows that his State seems to have prospered a great deal under the commission's system of rates.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania has prospered because of its industry; that is true; but the fact that the conditions in the coal business are what they are to-day is sufficient answer to the Senator's question.

Let me give you another illustration: The people of Washington, D. C., would like to get their coal cheaply. Does the Senator from Missouri know that the rate from Meyersdale, Pa., which mines smokeless coal as good as any in the country, is kept up to the same level as the rate from Kentucky, although the distance from Kentucky and from the Pocahontas region is more than twice what it is from Meyersdale, and the people of Washington to-day are paying tribute to the railroads in an unnecessarily high freight rate, kept up in order that the competition between those two points may be on an exact equality?

In other words, the Interstate Commerce Commission has undertaken to revise the geography of the country so as to equalize geographic advantages that ought to belong to the nearest point, and ought to be reflected in the price to the consumer.

Does the Senator know also, when he talks about the gradual disappearance of the Pittsburgh business in coal to the Lakes, and the gradual assumption of that business by the southern fields, that these so-called advantages in modern methods of mining and cleaning coal and all that do not make one penny's worth of difference to the consumer; that the price of the coal is the same at the point of sale; that both of them must ship clean coal, or they can not sell it; that those advantages that he speaks of are not reflected in the market price in the least? Does the Senator know that the principal advantage that these southern fields have that he defends so eloquently is that they are operated by nonunion labor, in towns privately owned, where there is not so much as a public street, and that a union man is not permitted to get off a railroad train in those towns, whereas in Pennsylvania the mines are either unionized or they have been trying to maintain the union scale for labor?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, are we to understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania thinks that that is any of the business of the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the law?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator is to understand, if he will, that I think it is one reason for the great advantage of these Southern States, and that the reasons ascribed by the Senator from Missouri do not tell the whole story.

Mr. GLASS. But I am asking the Senator if he thinks the statute confers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to determine and to manage and to regulate these conditions?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course, I do not.

Mr. GLASS. Then, why is the Senator reciting them?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am reciting them because the Senator from Missouri recited these other matters that are none of their business, such as methods of mining and methods of cleaning coal, as being the reasons for their superiority.

Mr. GLASS. But that is just exactly what they have made their business, and that is the explanation given in private letters of commissioners in pointing out the reasons for the decision.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am not familiar with the private letters of the commissioners.

Mr. GLASS. I mean private in the sense that they were not made public. I have one of them on my desk, and I am going to present it to the Senate at the proper time.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Referring to the reflection in the price to the consumer, if the freight rate were reduced pro rata with the freight rate now charged to Kentucky, as quoted by the Senator, would not the difference in the price of coal per ton be reflected to the consumer?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely. If we were given a comparable rate, we could sell that coal so much more cheaply that they would never be able to sell here at all.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SACKETT. Is it not a fact that if the railroads that are carrying the coals from the southern fields were permitted by the Interstate Commerce Commission to put into effect the rate which they say is compensatory, and that rate were applied to the coal that has gone over the Great Lakes from those fields in the last two or three years, it would afford an economy to the purchasers in the Northwest of more than $5,000,000 a year, and without any loss to any carrier that took care of that coal?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely; and the next thing would be a reduction of the same amount by the northern roads, and that would mean a gain to the consumer.

Mr. SACKETT. And that is the very thing that should be opened to competition in this country. The fact of the case is that the southern carriers are so developed that they can carry coal cheaper over these long distances. They have not the expensive terminals, they have not the charges that the northern carriers must meet; and for that reason the people of this country, both as producers and as consumers, are entitled to the free flow of railroad rates as long as they are compensatory and nothing else.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Personally, I should be very glad to see such a system adopted; but if that is adopted, the differential will be maintained between the southern and the northern fields, and it ought to be. Geography determines that. It ought not to be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission or by the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the junior Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. A moment ago the Senator stated that the coal produced in Kentucky that comes in competition with this Pennsylvania coal was produced in localities where the operating companies own the towns. In reply to that, I desire to say that there are only two important centers in Kentucky where the companies own the towns, and one of them is owned by the United States Coal & Coke Co., a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation, which is largely identified with Pennsylvania industry and politics.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not agree with the last sentence, but I did not know about that. I believe also that the same company owns a considerable amount of coal in the Pocahontas region of West Virginia; and if it so happens that that company is displeased with what I am saying, I suppose I will have to take the consequences. Is that what the Senator means?

Mr. BARKLEY. No. I am not interested in whether what the Senator says is pleasing to the owners of these coal corporations or not; but he made a statement a moment ago that I am sure, unintentionally, did not accurately state the situation.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I did not single out Kentucky, but I do say that in southern West Virginia and in Virginia there is town after town in which no union man dares dismount from a train.

Mr. BARKLEY. I know of no section in Kentucky where any such condition exists.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator may appeal in that way for the votes of laboring men in Pennsylvania, but I bring him back to the original proposition: Does he contend that the Interstate Commerce Commission have anything whatsoever to do with that—that they are vested with authority to say what enterprise may be operated by union men and what enterprise shall or shall not be operated under open-shop conditions?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course, I do not; and——

Mr. GLASS. Then, what is the pertinence of that sort of recital here?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not see why the Senator restrained himself so well when the Senator from Missouri was narrating points of superiority that he thought the southern fields had, if he gets so excited when I try to carry the narration to a conclusion.

Mr. GLASS. I am not in the least excited. There are so many people here who misinterpret earnestness for intemperateness. I am not at all excited about the matter. I retort, however, that I did not hear the Senator from Missouri cite a single, solitary fact that was not actually pertinent to this discussion—not one.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I dare say it seemed so to the Senator when he was talking about the relative efficiency of their methods of cleaning coal; but perhaps the Senator can tell me what the Interstate Commerce Commission has to do with that.

Mr. GLASS. It has not anything to do with it; and my protest is that it has undertaken to have something to do with it, and has asserted that as a reason for its decision, not based upon a scientific adjustment of railroad rates or transportation charges with a view to their compensatory nature, but basing its decision upon operating conditions with which it has nothing on earth to do, and which, if it should have anything to do with, would be a menace to the industry and to the commerce of this country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Now I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator take the position that it is the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the law so to arrange railroad rates that the coal operators of one State or district shall be preferred over the coal operators and the coal business in another district?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I take the position that they ought not to be. I say that they have been, that we have protested against it; but up to date the process has not been effective.

Mr. McKELLAR. The differential is all in favor of the Pennsylvania and Ohio fields, and not in favor of the southern districts at all.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. O Mr. President, the Senator could not have been here when I stated some of the instances of the application of that schedule that show that in many cases the longer haul is made for a lower freight rate than the shorter haul is made. That is the way that works out.

Mr. SACKETT. Should it not be, if it costs less to make it?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator mean to contend that the coal should be carried for a greater mileage at a lower rate than for the lower mileage, provided that railroad can show it is making money at it?

Mr. SACKETT. If it is making more than a compensatory rate, yes. I do not think anybody would doubt it; and that is one of the advantages that the different fields of activity in all industry have in this country. It is the only way in which you can develop the country as a whole and not develop it in local foci which happen to be near to markets. The other industries farther away must find a method of transportation, find methods of getting their products shipped more cheaply, or else you will have the country developed in spots and not as a whole.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am afraid, if the Senator's theory were applied——

Mr. SACKETT. It has been applied in agriculture, in lumber, in every kind of commodity in this country; and that is the way in which industries have been built up over the country.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And that is the way in which certain industries are smothered, just as ours have been, and that is what is the matter with the Mountain States to-day; and the Senator knows it.

Mr. SACKETT. The Senator knows that the industry in Pittsburgh has been paying a higher cost of production; that the industry in Pittsburgh has been fighting for a larger differential; that, having accomplished a differential, the industry in Pittsburgh is now turning around under a nonunion basis to get a lower cost of production in addition to the railroad differential; and not only will the other parts of the country be shut out of this lake trade but they will be unduly developed in the Pittsburgh district.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We need not waste any time in the assertion of opinions on that subject. If we will simply look at the picture that is presented to-day, we will see the result of it.

In Pittsburgh and in the Pennsylvania districts there exists to-day a most desperate condition of unemployment and distress. It has been pictured to the Senate eloquently by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. Why is that so? Simply because the differential established by the Interstate Commerce Commission is not yet adequate. Simply because the Pittsburgh and the Pennsylvania region is being driven, by that unfair competition, away from the union scale that it has maintained to a similarly low scale if it is going to stay in business. We will get down to it, I suppose, if the commission and the Senate and the Government of the United States persist in this theory; they will drive us down to the same low scale, and they will drive all union labor out of the mining industry; and I suppose that is what is desired. But the process is one of agony, I tell the Senate, and we are going through that agony in Pennsylvania to-day.

It is all very well to stand here and denounce me and the Republican officials of Pennsylvania. That is begging the question. That is no help to the people who are suffering up there in those coal fields to-day. That is no help to the union men who are being driven out of those fields. It is begging the question, I say, to get up and denounce the Interstate Commerce Commission or to say that I tried to pack the commission when I recommended the appointment of 1 man out of 11, who distinctly stated that he would not vote in this case, anyway. It is nice politics to say that I am packing the Interstate Commerce Commission. The facts, I think, answer that sufficiently. To-day in Pennsylvania and in eastern Ohio there are many thousands of people in want, and it is not helping them to turn this into a political discussion.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the distress to which the Senator has referred, which is the inevitable result of enforced idleness, is one thing of which even Pennsylvania coal operators neither claim nor seek a monopoly. Despite the boasted prosperity of this administration, unemployment to an alarming extent—and all the suffering that it entails—exists not only in Pennsylvania but in practically every State of the Union. But no amount of unemployment, no extent of industrial depression, and no severity of competition can justify an attempt to pack the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Let me dispel any erroneous impression that the Senator from Pennsylvania may have created to the effect that the bituminous coal mines of Pennsylvania are being operated by union labor, and that those of West Virginia, Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee are being operated nonunion. As a matter of fact, every great soft-coal mine in the State of Pennsylvania that is now in operation is manned by nonunion labor. Furthermore, the operators of West Virginia are paying their miners wages similar to those paid by the operators of Pennsylvania.

The Senator from Pennsylvania very becomingly complains that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] erred in stating that the Pennsylvania coal operators obtained all that they asked from the Interstate Commerce Commission, when, in fact, these Pennsylvania captains of industry have received only half as much as they want, and are, accordingly, thoroughly dissatisfied. But why does the Senator not make a complete confession and proclaim the fact that nothing less than the whole "earth and the fullness thereof" will ever satisfy those for whom he so ably and successfully speaks. Let us admit the hideous truth once for all that the Pennsylvania coal operators do not want a square deal in the matter of freight rates at the hands of an honest commission. What they do want is an exclusive monopoly of the coal business of the country created and perpetuated for them by a packed commission.

We admit the validity of the Senator's contention that the people of Pennsylvania are entitled to two Senators. But they are no more entitled to have one whose election is tainted with fraud seated in this Chamber than they are to enjoy the benefits of a decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission that was obtained by political intimidation and coercion.

Mr. GOODING and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. NEELY. I yield first to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GOODING. I would like to ask the Senator from West Virginia when he expects this political influence, which he says is controlling the commission, to cease? Will it not continue until Congress lays down a policy to guide the Interstate Commerce Commission in the making of rates? The Senator's section is not the only one which has suffered through discrimination. The West has suffered through discrimination in freight rates for half a century, and is suffering to-day, and it will continue to suffer just as long as Congress permits the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates without a policy laid down by Congress.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. NEELY. Judging from present indications, political control of the Interstate Commerce Commission will never end. Therefore I am ready and eager to join the Senator from Idaho in passing a law to restrain this commission, which "doth bestride the narrow world like a Colossus" and which destroys the great industries of one State and on their ashes creates monopolies for some other State.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. NEELY. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. When I offered an amendment to the resolution yesterday calling for an Interstate Commerce Committee investigation of the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in this regard the Senator voted against it, did he not?

Mr. NEELY. Yes; because I believed that the adoption of the amendment would delay the investigation of the conditions now prevailing in the mining regions of the Senator's State, which, according to the recent narration of the eloquent Senator from California, are the most disgraceful that have ever existed in any coal-mining region in the United States.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And the Senator was not even willing to have an impartial committee find out whether our complaints or his are true with regard to these rates.

Mr. NEELY. I certainly was, still am, and ever shall be willing to have such a committee investigate the Interstate Commerce Commission and also to ascertain, if the committee live long enough to accomplish the task, just how many highly discriminatory freight rates the commission has benevolently ordained and established for the exclusive benefit of the coal operators of Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then, if I understand the Senator correctly, he prefers that the facts should be dealt with by assertion rather than investigation.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator's perceptive faculties are evidently not functioning with their usual accuracy.

I shall gladly support any resolution that proposes a proper investigation of the matter we are discussing.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. SACKETT. I do not know whether the Senator from West Virginia knows that I introduced a resolution for this very purpose this morning in the Senate, which has been referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It contains the identical language in one of its paragraphs that was proposed yesterday to be attached to the Johnson resolution by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will support it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In other words, the resolution is no good when I offer it, but it is all right for the Senator to support it if it is offered from Kentucky.

Mr. SACKETT. The resolution is put in the proper place, where it belongs, and not hitched to something to which it does not belong.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator from West Virginia has heard the Senators from the West plead for some kind of legislation in relation to the long-and-short-haul clause. Has not the Senator from West Virginia voted against it every time?

Mr. NEELY. Only once. But the question of the "long and short haul" is not in issue now. It was disposed of in the distant past. Let me remind the Senator from Utah, as Pompey reminded Sylla, "that more worship the rising than the setting sun." Let the Senator now propose legislation that will curb the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I shall aid him in passing it through the Senate, but the Senator should also provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall never again succumb to the political threats nor yield to the political coercion of the coal operators of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not talking about Pennsylvania. For 16 years, at least, the Western States have suffered on account of freight rates as no other States in this Union have suffered, and the only excuse given for not affording relief was that an amendment of the long-and-short-haul clause was not the proper thing to do, and we suffered in the West on that account. We have tried here for 16 years to get some kind of favorable action, but up to the present time we have not gotten any.

Mr. NEELY. The people of Pennsylvania are the only ones who get what they want in the matter of freight rates.

Mr. SMOOT. This discussion, in my opinion, will draw the matter to the attention of the country, and we have hopes that the next time the question comes up we shall get some support from the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senator from West Virginia will allow me, I am going to ask leave to express regret that he has fallen a victim to the craft of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, who is undertaking to convert this question into a sectional question and actually undertaking to convert it into a political question. Until the Senator from Pennsylvania spoke, nobody, as I recall, had thought of introducing politics into a matter of this sort, and I want to say for myself that what concerns me fundamentally and most of all is not how the Interstate Commerce Commission has exercised power, but whether or not the Interstate Commerce Commission has actually usurped authority and appropriated to itself a power that is a positive menace to the entire country.

That is the question involved here. It is not one of Republicanism or Democracy, or of the North or of the South, as the Senator from Pennsylvania so adroitly undertakes to make it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And yet the Senator voted yesterday against my amendment, which had the sole object of finding out whether the commission had usurped such a power.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no. The Senator knows perfectly well why I voted against his amendment. He knows that just as well as he knows why he offered the amendment to the particular resolution at that particular time. Now, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] has here to-day offered a resolution not only covering the ground proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania but even more comprehensively. The resolution is one which, I understand, the Senator from Pennsylvania approves, and I shall vote for it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course, the Senator will vote for it, because he voted against a similar resolution yesterday when I introduced it.

Mr. GLASS. Of course, I am always inconsistent and I have some personal animus toward the Senator from Pennsylvania! The Senator from Pennsylvania is brutally frank, and now, if he will excuse me for being brutally frank right on this point, I will say that I suspect that the Senator offered his resolution in order to divert attention from the strike and the consequent conditions of that strike in Pennsylvania to another subject entirely.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am glad the Senator is brutally frank, because that gives me a chance to disillusion him. If the Senator had bothered to read my amendment——

Mr. GLASS. I did.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Or had listened to it when read, he would have noticed that it provided for an investigation into the rate phases of the case only after the completion of the report on the strike and the conditions there.

Mr. GLASS. But that was to be the outstanding feature of the investigation in the mind of the Senator from Pennsylvania, as I suspect it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Perhaps the Senator may suspect it, but the Senator who proposed the resolution, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], evidently did not suspect anything of the sort. The language of the amendment made it very clear that it could not postpone an investigation into the strike, so that it seems to me——

Mr. GLASS. The Senator will agree with me that that water is over the wheel, and I tell him now that it is my purpose to vote for the resolution presented here to-day by the Senator from Kentucky, because I have no desire in the world to conceal any of the pertinent facts which relate to this problem.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It would be pleasant for most of us if inconsistency could be disposed of by saying it is water over the wheel.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator knows perfectly well that properly no politics are involved in the determination of this problem, that properly no sectionalism is involved in the determination of this problem, and it is unworthy of the Senator to undertake to muster his forces upon the plea of politics or upon the plea of the northern mine against the southern mine.

I say that if the Interstate Commerce Commission have undertaken to appropriate and exercise power with respect to northern mines that they have undertaken to exercise with respect to southern industries, I would feel just about like I feel now. It is a usurpation of power. It is a dangerous usurpation of power, and an end should be made of it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator's suspicions are rather alert to-day. Will the Senator tell me whether he suspected any political purpose in the address of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GLASS. I did not discover any.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I hope that the Senator from Virginia is not justified in believing or even fearing that the Senator from Pennsylvania has succeeded in diverting the attention of the Senate from the merits of the question which the Senator from Missouri has so ably discussed to the irrelevant subjects of politics and localities.

But, regardless of what the Senator from Pennsylvania has or has not accomplished, I implore the Senate to exercise its power to the limit to prevent further usurpations on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to restrain the commission from pursuing its present policy of ruthlessly destroying prosperity in one section of the country in order to create it in another.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] in replying to my remarks spoke of me as a new recruit to the southern group. That is a singular notion for the Senator to entertain. I do not know why he made the statement. I have been disturbed over this decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission since it was rendered. I have been disturbed over every assumption by the Interstate Commerce Commission which apparently looks toward an attempt of that body to equalize the natural advantage one place might have by fixing a freight rate to remove that natural advantage. I have regarded this recent decision as revolutionary.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, has not the Supreme Court held time and again that that could not be done?

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is my understanding.

I have no antipathy toward Pennsylvania, not the least. I regard Pennsylvania as one of the great States of the Union. I know that within her borders are to be found some of the best people of the United States. I know that she has a wonderful history. I know that she is entitled to fair and just treatment, as, indeed, are all the other States. If I have had the unfortunate task of helping to develop the fact that the great people of Pennsylvania are not permitted to register their will, and to bring out the fact that this grand old State has fallen upon evil times, I trust it will be understood that if it had happened to have been some other State where similar conditions existed I would have tried to perform my duty there as I have in this instance. Indeed, it so happened that when Michigan went straying after strange gods, and set up a golden calf in the temple of her politics, I helped in the movement to repudiate that action. I have done the same thing in the case of Illinois and will be glad to do it in any other State if unfortunately similar conditions exist. I do not possess that kind of pliable conscience which will cause me to stand upon the platform one day and denounce a political opponent as every kind of rogue and scoundrel and to declare that his presence in public office would be a debasement of the office and an insult to decency and then, when he triumphs, to join at once with him to consummate the iniquity and complete the insult by putting him in public office.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Is the Senator implying that I did that?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am implying that it has been stated time and time again in the public press that the Senator from Pennsylvania and the gentlemen who operated with him denounced Mr. VARE as a wholly unfit man to occupy a seat in this body. If that is to be denied, it will be denied now for the first time to my knowledge.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator shifts his ground. That is not the statement that he made before I asked the question. I want to say now that——

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have not shifted my ground.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator permit me to answer?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I want to say that I opposed Mr. VARE in the primary with all my power; I did my best to prevent his being nominated; I argued that his opponent, Senator Pepper, was, in my judgment, a better candidate. So far so true. That I ever made any such statement as the Senator indicated just before I interrupted him I deny. I never heard such an accusation made before, and I want most emphatically to say that nothing of the kind ever happened.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Did not the Senator say in substance and effect, and was he not quoted by the press as saying in substance and effect, that Mr. VARE was wholly unfit for this position?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I said I thought he was less qualified than Mr. Pepper.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The party thought differently and nominated him, and I supported their choice.

Mr. REED of Missouri. And the Senator said some other things. I shall be glad to file some of those statements in the RECORD.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I wish the Senator would do so.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I shall send for them. That, however, I am only mentioning because the intimation is made that in denouncing this revolutionary decision I have some ulterior purpose. I opposed Mr. Wood's confirmation long ago, and I intend to oppose the confirmation of any man who is nominated to a judicial position or a semijudicial position in order that he may represent a particular district unless he lives in that district and his jurisdiction is confined to that district.

We have heard a curious argument here to-day. Pennsylvania has 11,000,000 of people, I believe it was stated, and she originates one-sixth of the tonnage that is shipped. Therefore, because she originates one-sixth of the tonnage that is shipped, she is entitled to direct representation upon a judicial body that decides what is fair to all of the people of the United States. That is a fine kind of logic! When did it happen that the Interstate Commerce Commission was a body created to represent shippers alone; that shippers only were to be considered? The Interstate Commerce Commission was created by the people of the United States to see that just rates were fixed to every part of the United States for the benefit of every human being and every industry in the United States. It was not set up to equalize differences in the cost of manufacture; it was not created for the benefit of shippers; it was created for the benefit of all of the people.

We had some argument that, upon its face, while entirely aside from this question, was calculated to give the impression that the Interstate Commerce Commission in the past had dealt very unjustly with Pennsylvania in the matter of rates. That is based upon the fact that the haul is longer in some instances than in others; it is longer in some instances from the southern fields than it is from the Pennsylvania fields; but anybody who knows anything about freight hauls knows that mileage is not the only element to be considered. A haul of 10 miles involves all the expense and all the labor of the loading and unloading of cars and the furnishing of cars just as much as is involved in a haul of a thousand miles. However, I am not going to waste time arguing details of that kind.

The fact is there is but one rule that can be justly established; there is but one task the Interstate Commerce Commission has a right to perform with reference to rates. It has the right to insist that no railroad shall charge a rate which is more than compensatory. It has no just right to say to any railroad if it is charging rates that are fairly compensatory, "You shall not reduce your rates." The point at issue here is that the carriers operating from the southern fields say that they can afford to haul coal to Washington at a certain rate; that they can afford to haul lake cargo coal at a certain rate; that they want to haul it at that rate; and the Interstate Commerce Commission says, "You have got to charge more than that rate for the purpose of helping the Pennsylvania mines."

They do not propose further to reduce the rates from Pennsylvania. If they did, we would have no complaint. Let them fix them wherever they please. Let the railroads of Pennsylvania reduce their rates as low as they please; there will be no protest from Missouri against that. That will help all the consumers of the United States; but when the Interstate Commerce Commission says, "We propose to equalize natural conditions of advantage by forcing railroads to raise rates beyond the point they want to charge, beyond the point that is compensatory," then the Interstate Commerce Commission is asserting a power to override natural conditions, to destroy the enterprise of men, to set its arbitrary mandate up against the business judgment of men.

Let us see where we will end. A man goes into a given territory and finds there within a given radius a certain population; he finds there a market for the thing which he sees fit to produce, and settling down there, he proceeds to invest his capital. After he has invested it and the railroads are willing to haul his product at a rate that will enable him to live and make a profit, the Interstate Commerce Commission can come in under this new rule and say, "We will destroy your business; we will set aside your judgment; we will ruin your life's work; we will change the railroad rate; we will drive you out of business, because there is somebody in some other town and some other place who did not locate as wisely as you and we want to enrich him at your disadvantage." That is the proposition that is here and that is the whole proposition that is here.

So far as I am concerned, men like Esch who hold that doctrine are usurpers of power, and an usurper of power is not fit to hold any office within the gift of a free people.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I rose a few moments ago to speak, and what I have to say is not so appropriate now as it would have been before the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] spoke.

However, I do wish to say that it is very amusing to me to see Senators from the coal States in a fight. I am glad they are having it, because this rumpus will call the attention of the country to an industrial and economic situation which must be taken care of in some wise way.

What I have to say has no bearing at all upon the address of the Senator from Missouri, because I did not have the pleasure of hearing it, but the doctors from the coal States who are proposing treatment for the symptoms which they have observed, and are observing, at the present time in the coal industry are merely proposing to treat symptoms. What they are recommending has nothing whatever to do with the cure of the real disease. Their diagnosis is wrong, as the Senator from Texas suggests.

I see upon the floor an able Member of the House of Representative from my State, Major LAGUARDIA. He has reported regarding the suffering and the misery in the State of Pennsylvania; there can be no doubt of the suffering that has taken place there, but, Mr. President, the real trouble with the coal industry is overproduction.

We may find fault with the Interstate Commerce Commission from now until kingdom come, but that commission has no power at present, as I see it, to correct the real trouble. How can they deal with the problem of overproduction? How can they deal with the situation that there are three or four thousand more mines than there should be? How can they deal with the fact that there are a quarter of a million miners in excess of the number we need?

As I view it, Senators, we must relax the antitrust laws so as to permit the bituminous coal operators to consolidate their mines, to deal with this problem collectively, to have collective sales agencies in order that the problem may be solved. Of course, if they are to have the privilege of consolidation, they must submit to a certain amount of regulation; otherwise, there will be a monopoly created which will mean high prices and increased suffering everywhere. That, however, is the way it must be dealt with, as I view it. There is not any use talking about modifying the rates on coal; there is not any use talking about trying to send abroad the surplus coal. The surplus is too great.

The problem can not be dealt with in that way, and, as a matter of fact, why should we seek to find means of exporting coal and sending coal abroad when posterity will need this coal? Why not reserve it here for the citizens who are to come after us? There can be, in my judgment, consolidations, cooperative selling, and other means of dealing with the problem, so that the mines which should be operated—the cheaply operated mines can be operated and the high-priced mines can be closed for the time being.

Let us face the situation as it is. All this row between the Senators from one section and the Senators from another section is only throwing dust—coal dust—into the air. They are not reaching at all the fundamental trouble; and that is the thing which must be dealt with if we are to solve this problem in any permanent way.

The other day a man wrote to me with a plan by which he proposes to collect a fee from every ton of coal mined—a McNary-Haugen bill for the coal business—in order that we might ship the coal abroad and sell it.

Senators, let us find some way to solve this problem by consolidations of mines and by directing the surplus miners into other channels of activity and then preserve the surplus of coal for citizens who come after us. It is all nonsense, as I view it, to spend our time here discussing about whether a preferential rate given one section of the country is detrimental or beneficial.

So far as the great industry is concerned, and so far as the present and future needs of the country are concerned, they are not involved in this question of rates; and we never can solve the problem by any such absurd method or any such attempt at remedy.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I am very much delighted at this discussion here to-day. I agree that this is stirring up a row between certain States, but I am glad the row is stirred up. This question of discriminations, I hope, will turn out to be of enough importance to the whole country to lead the Congress to action upon the transportation question.

This discrimination between the coal States is a tempest in a teapot compared to the discrimination that has existed for years and years as against the whole agricultural industry in the United States.

Class I railroads derived a total of $915,000,000 from freight on agricultural products in the year 1923. This does not include forest products. It represented 12½ per cent of the total cash income from sales of agricultural products, and 18.7 per cent of the estimated net farm income for the years 1923 and 1924.

The products of the farm have contributed 19.8 per cent to the revenues of the railroads, and they furnished only 11 per cent of the tonnage.

The mere statement of that fact shows a discrimination in volume several times bigger than this coal question.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] points out that his haul is shorter for coal than it is in West Virginia and Kentucky, and therefore he is entitled to a lower rate. Of course, that haul is not over the same road and at the same expense. We have had the proposition of the long-and-short haul up over the same road between points included in the same haul, and I do not think the Senator from Pennsylvania supported us.

Mr. FESS. Yes; he did.

Mr. BROOKHART. Did he? Well, I am glad he did. I think some of the Senators representing West Virginia and Kentucky were afraid to support us, fearing it would prejudice their case in reference to the haul of coal. It would do no such thing if the facts as they state them are true, that the expense of their long haul is less than the expense of the short haul from Pennsylvania. But the fact remains that this gigantic discrimination against agriculture in the whole country as to railroad transportation exists everywhere.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] blames the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am not inclined to do that, because I think the Esch-Cummins railroad law itself fixed this matter so as to invite and to promote these discriminations. The commission can no longer consider individual rates upon their cost or their individual reasonableness. Under this law it is now compelled to take the average of the whole thing, and average it up and work out a 5¾ per cent return on the capital investment, and that capital investment watered by $7,000,000,000 above its market value at the time the tentative value was fixed by the commission.

I do not claim that they violated the law in putting that value in there. They followed the law. It was the law itself that was wrong.

Oh, yes; I remember, but a few years ago, when these same discriminations existed in our neighbor, in Canada. Canada has been wise, and has solved this problem and they no longer exist there. Canada consolidated some of her railroads, and did it by the power of the Government and under the control of the Government. The watered capital ceased, and these discriminations ceased, and the one remaining system privately operated is compelled to meet the competition of an honest government.

You can talk about solving this problem by appointing somebody on a commission that may change a particular case or a particular situation, but I have been fighting rate discriminations against my State for 20 years. I remember when the whole rate system was built upon the basing-point idea in the United States. I remember when you could ship products from Chicago to Omaha and then back to Des Moines cheaper than you could put them off at Des Moines on the way through, because Omaha was the basing point. On the north it was St. Paul, and on the south it was St. Louis.

Following that idea of building up these big centers at the expense of the little places, these great systems of rate discrimination were put in. It was after years of fight that we removed some of them, and now a good many of them have crept back in again under this new law.

So the law and the system itself must be changed. It is a fundamental proposition, and it will not be fought out by simply defeating this commissioner or that commissioner, although I myself am heartily in favor of defeating some of those commissioners who misrepresent us.

ALIEN PROPERTY AND OTHER CLAIMS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7201) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That this act may be cited as the "Settlement of war claims act of 1928."

CLAIMS OF NATIONALS OF THE UNITED STATES AGAINST GERMANY

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary of State shall, from time to time, certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, established in pursuance of the agreement of August 10, 1922, between the United States and Germany (referred to in this act as the "Mixed Claims Commission").

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay an amount equal to the principal of each award so certified, plus the interest thereon, at the rate fixed in the award, accruing before January 1, 1928.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay annually (as nearly as may be) simple interest, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, upon the amounts payable under subsection (b) and remaining unpaid, beginning January 1, 1928, until paid.

(d) The payments authorized by subsection (b) or (c) shall be made in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, but only out of the German special deposit account created by section 4, within the limitations hereinafter prescribed, and in the order of priority provided in subsection (c) of section 4.

(e) There shall be deducted from the amount of each payment, as reimbursement for the expenses incurred by the United States in respect thereof, an amount equal to one-half of 1 per cent thereof. The amount so deducted shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. In computing the amounts payable under subsection (c) of section 4 (establishing the priority of payments) the fact that such deduction is required to be made from the payment when computed or that such deduction has been made from prior payments, shall be disregarded.

(f) The amounts awarded to the United States in respect of claims of the United States on its own behalf shall not be payable under this section.

(g) No payment shall be made under this section unless application therefor is made, within two years after the date of the enactment of this act, in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Payment shall be made only to the person on behalf of whom the award was made, except that—

(1) If such person is deceased or is under a legal disability, payment shall be made to his legal representative, except that if the payment is not over $500 it may be made to the persons found by the Secretary of the Treasury to be entitled thereto, without the necessity of compliance with the requirements of law in respect of the administration of estates;

(2) In the case of a partnership, association, or corporation, the existence of which has been terminated, payment shall be made, except as provided in paragraphs (3) and (4), to the persons found by the Secretary of the Treasury to be entitled thereto;

(3) If a receiver or trustee for the person on behalf of whom the award was made has been duly appointed by a court in the United States and has not been discharged prior to the date of payment, payment shall be made to the receiver or trustee or in accordance with the order of the court; and

(4) In the case of an assignment of an award, or an assignment (prior to the making of the award) of the claim in respect of which the award was made, by a receiver or trustee for any such person, duly appointed by a court in the United States, such payment shall be made to the assignee.
